BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

Have you ever watched a boy take an old watch down, take out his pocket knife and through pure curiosity take it apart to see what makes the wheels go around? I believe this has happened in every boy's life at one time or another. He may possess a watch some time before he becomes curious enough about its parts to tear it up, but as sure as you live he will sooner or later look into it.

Let us imagine our Scout Oath is a watch. A boy will learn the Oath and for a time be satisfied with just knowing it, but as he becomes more attracted to Scouting he will have that barbarious desire to tear it apart to see what makes it go round. Good for you, that's the way to find out about it, see for yourself.

Our good friend H. W. Hurt became affected with this desire, so he is tearing into the oath. So, gather around fellows and let's see what he finds.

'UPON MY HONOR' (that's the crystal)—which is not merely my reputation—what people see and think of me—but which is privacy of my own life composes my real rules of playing a square game of life—"I" —an individual with life and powers which are the gift of the Infite; with a brain which knows not the limits of space or time; a personality clothed with the dignity and duty of immortal soul, I,—"WILL DO MY BEST"—not any half-hearted effort but my whole best, it is my solemn pledge given upon my word.

"TO DO MY DUTY"—my part, which I owe to others; for everybody in the world must wo the part which the constant services of others to him demands of him if he is to be a real member of society "TO GOD" —every man owes to the Infinite God whose natural laws control the universe with its life and air, its sun and shade, its plants and trees, and running brooks, its song of bird and its richer song of friendship and love and service—every man owes to Infinite a duty of being in harmony with this great life and the further obligation not to lessen but to enrich its beauty, its happiness, its service; this a a great moral law—"AND MY COUNTRY"—the people, th ehistory, the institutions. the privileges, the laws, the traditions, the ideals, the service each of us contributes to the others, the recognition of the rights of others as the most solemn guaranty of my own, the liberty of responsibility and the responsibility of liberty—all these as much as the Broad fields lofty mountains, majestic rivers, these are the country to which I pledge myself to do my duty by controlling myself, by adding to its wealth and happiness, by obeying its laws and protecting the common welfare, to die for it if need be or the equally difficult duty of living for it—My Country!

"AND TO OBEY THE SCOUT LAW"—not alone in the letter, but in the Spiri tof the fine citizenship it represents.

"TO HELP OTHERS AT ALL TIMES"—to be a source of strength and right in the world, as the ancient knights pledged themselves to defend the weak, relieve suffering, oppose wrongs and injustice and to give a reday joyous help to anyone who needs it, not to be seen of others but to give of my strength to those who need it—recognizing that I possess strength not for myself but it is mine to use so that those who lack it may find it in me.

"TO KEEP MYSELF"—not that the energy of others shall have to be spent in keeping me, but that I shall be responsible for myself, that I am sufficiently a man to keep myself—

"PHYSICALLY STRONG" — for good health is the basic of all happiness and of usefulness in the world—this means that I shall learn about my body and brain and keep them strong, ready to serve and shall avoid those things which will undermine my health or limit my readiness to serve hte world; I shall not only abstain from weakening, but I will take active steps to develop and conceive its powers and functions—"MENTALLY AWAKE"—my brain, I shall develop more and more and shall use its powers for useful ends; I shal lendeavor to keep my mind growing. learning something more about life each day, striving to become more efficient, to develop my possibilities — "AND MORALLY STRAIGHT"—I shall take pride in keeping my thoughts and desires and deeds clean by keeping them directed toward lofty things. I shall faith fully guard my creative reproductive powers and shall not debase them for myself. I shall take pride in being my best nad truest self.

Well, there it is felows, all torn t opieces and in a neat pile. You can save yours now and get the full use of it and still know what it contains.

FOREST FIRES LAST YEAR SMALLER

MONTGOMERY—In spite of reduced funds and an extremely severe fall drought, the forest fire losses within the organized territory of Alabama were held ot a proportion of 5 1-2 % of the woodland area. The organized territory comprises thos eforest sections of the State over which the Commission of Forestry is able to maintain local agents, observers and patrolmen. The area thus organized comprises 8-211-740 acres.

In the unorganized territory, how ever, for which lack of funds does not permit the employment of field workers, the proportion burned amounted to about 11 2-3%. The pro portion for the entire woodland area of the state totalled approximately 9 1-2%.

While the unorganized territory is necessarily without the services of agents and other local forestral employees, it nevertheless receives considerable attention in the way of gen eral educational work of statewide character. In the absence of funds with which to extend the field work over the entire state, informational and educational srevice is the next best procedure. That it has a definite value in ofrest fire protection in the unorganized territory is evidenced by the reduction of the average annaul proportion burned from approximately 35 percent, prior to the initiation of the educational work to a current average of about 9 per cent.

A METHODIST CALL

By Henry M. Hurst

Today is cold, but Spring will come,
With gentle breezes blowing;
The birds will chirp, the flowers spring
With all their colors glowing.
So just brace up, dismiss your grouch
And come to Church next Sunday,
At eleven o'clock and seven too,
And you'll feel better Monday.
You'll find a hearty welcome where
The long, lank parson preaches
We'll expect you there, rain, snow or fair
In those same old Sunday breeches.

Say, tune in on W A P I at 4:30 each afternoon and hear Evangelist John Brown, who is preaching in revival at First Methodist Church in Birmingham.

A MESSAGE

TO THE VOTERS OF THE SIXTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT FROM PETE B. JARMAN, JR.

Having been affiliated with the public life, first of my county and later of my state throughout my life I like to think of myself as a public servant. To serve my fellow Alabamians, my party and my nation to th ebest of my ability has ever been my keen desire.

I am appreciative, indeed, of the general sentiment, which seems to have crystallized throughout the Sixth District shortly following my good, but unsuccessful, race for Congress two years ago, that I should run again which race would prove successful.

Because of this sentiment my announcement for Congress will cause no surprise. My campaign will, of course, be waged on a high plane. While in the final analysis all candidates must primarily stand on their records, the other planks of my platform will follow in due course.

While I was reasonable acquainted with the District when I announced before, many new acquaintances ripened into friendships during the campaign which will afford me much pleasure throughout the remaining years of my life. During my visits in the District since many other strong friendships have occurred, literally thousands, who for various good reasons could not support me before, having assured me of their support in the event of another race.

In announcing my candidacy, I desire to gratefully acknowledge all of these assurances of support, new as well as old, and to pledge you my best efforts to make you a good Congressman. It will be my purpose to be YOUR representative in Washington, rendering allegiance to the whole people of the great Sixth District, poor and rich, low and high without favoritism to any clique or group. Toward that end, I want you to always feel free, during this campaign, as well as in the future, to discuss with me any issue in which you may be interested.

While it is my keen desire to see every voter in the District prior to the election, and frequently henceforth, I can scarcely hope to be so fortunate before May 5th. If I find it impossible to contact you, I hope you will get in touch with me or inquire from some friend as to my qualifications and experience for this very important post of service.

While my election appears most probable, the fact that politics is quite uncertain causes me to urge my friends to take nothing for granted and to continue their magnificent efforts in my behalf, particularly interesting themselves in getting out the vote, which will otherwise not be large in this off-year. If the opinion of many that we have an open road to this broader field of service is erroneous ,let's open it. If it is correct, let's make the victory cerain, positive and overwhelming.

Your efforts in my behalf will be deeply appreciated. I want, not only your vote, but your active energetic influence. Afterwards, your affairs at the Nation's Capitol will be regarded as an avowed public trust, and I will strive earnestly to serve my People, my District, my Party and my Nation well.

TOGETHER WE CANNOT, MUST NOT, WILL NOT FAIL.

Sincerely,
PETE B. JARMAN, JR.

AUBURN—"Always use purebred boars," advises F. W. Burns, extension husbandman.

2. For each 100 pounds of gain produced the grade pigs required 403 pounds of feed while the scrubs required 465 pounds of feed.

3. With feed costing $30. per ton th eaverage cost of producing 100 pounds of pork with the grade hogs was $6.4 compared with $6.97 for the scrubs.

MUNRO ADDRESSES SHELBY TEACHERS

Superintendent Paul M. Muro, of Selma, President of the Alabama Educational Association, in an address on Saturday, February 15th, in the Shelby County High School Auditorium, told the teachers of Shelby County that they should inform the public as to the true facts of educational affairs in Alabama. Mr. Munro stated that most people, who thought that the $14,000,000 required for the State Minimum Educational Program was an enormous sum did not realize that it amounted ot only fifteen cents per child per day as compared to a national average of fifty-six cents. He also asserted that few knew that during a recent year the average salary for white teachers was $584.00 for the year and some of the janitors of the churches in Selma received over $600. for their work in the same year.

After Superintendent Munro's address very interesting demonstration lessons were conducted by teachers of the Wilsonville, Calera and Columbiana schools. These lessons were not planned for display but were samples of routine work in these schools and showed what could be done by any teacher.

Following these demonstrations the regular extension classes were conducted by Mr. Anderson, Miss Wells and Miss Lawson, teachers at Alabama College.

Norris Urges Congress to Curb Supreme Court—Oratory on Lincoln Day—Death of Charles Curtis—Long Newspaper Tax Invalid.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

SPEAKING in advocacy of the administration's substitute farm bill, Senator Norris, the independent Republican from Nebraska, scathingly attacked the Supreme court's AAA decision and urged congress to use its right to curb the court's power. He argued that the 6 to 3 decision itself was unconstitutional by the court's own reasoning and shouted "It cannot stand."

Senator Norris

"The regulation of agricultural production, they say, is unconstitutional because not mentioned in the Constitution," Norris asserted. "Nowhere in that great document is there a syllable, a word, or a sentence giving to any court the right to declare an act of congress unconstitutional. Hence, when the court indulges in that pastime it is itself violating the Constitution according to its own words."

Norris quoted from the majority opinion of the Supreme court holding that the regulation and control of agricultural production was a local affair reserved to the states and beyond the power of congress. Under that decision, he declared, not only the pending bill but "a large portion of the laws which congress has passed during the last hundred years are absolutely unconstitutional."

Of the later decision ordering return of processing taxes to the processors, the senator said Secretary Wallace perhaps was too severe in calling it the greatest legalized steal in history, and added: "But it is a gift, the greatest gift since God made salvation free."

Norris urged that congress pass a law requiring unanimous decisions by the Supreme court to overrule the acts of the legislative branch of the government.

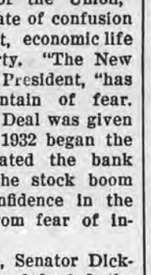
LINCOLN day was the occasion for a flood of oratory, largely by Republican opponents of the New Deal. Herbert Hoover spoke at Portland, Ore., on the "State of the Union," which he said was a state of confusion in thought, government, economic life and the ideals of liberty. "The New Deal," said the former President, "has been a veritable fountain of fear. The day after the New Deal was given life at the election of 1932 began the great fear which created the bank panic of March 4. The stock boom today is not from confidence in the future; it is partly from fear of inflation."

In Greensboro, N. C., Senator Dickinson of Iowa warmly defended the Supreme court as "the only remaining guardian of the liberty of the people," and inveighed against what he said was the New Deal's "planned economy" and its "attempted bribery of the states" through the invalidated AAA and its proposed substitute, the soil conservation measure.

Senator Vandenberg of Michigan was a speaker in New York city, and like his fellow Republicans he fiercely assailed the administration, terming it the "third party now in power."

Among the few leading Democrats heard was Secretary Wallace, who, in Indianapolis, defended the administration. Referring to the Constitution, he declared that "most of us" thought the agriculture adjustment act was valid, and "some of us, including three justices of the Supreme court, think so still."

CHARLES CURTIS, former Vice President of the United States and before that representative and senator from Kansas, died suddenly of heart disease at the Washington home of his brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. Edward E. Gann. He was seventy-six years old, and was the first man of Indian blood ever to preside over the senate. He was one-quarter Kaw Indian, his grandmother having been Princess Julie of that tribe who married a French voyageur. In his boyhood Curtis was a jockey, and later a reporter. Having studied law, he became a prosecutor at the age of twenty-four in Shawnee county, Kansas, and was elected to congress in 1892. He was made senator in 1907, was defeated in 1912, and two years later was again elected senator. He was elected Vice President on the ticket headed by Herbert Hoover, and was renominated for that position in 1932.



Charles Curtis

Mr. Curtis was greatly liked by his associates in Washington and his death caused genuine grief. President Roosevelt said:

"I am deeply distressed to learn of the sudden passing of my old friend, Charles Curtis. Whether they knew him as a senator, as the Vice President of the United States, or as the man he was in his own right, his legion of friends will remember him, always affectionately, and will mourn his passing."

Vice President Garner said:

"I was always fond of him. I was associated with him in the house and senate. He was a fine man and a good friend."

Funeral services for Mr. Curtis and the interment were in Topeka, Kan.

ONCE again the Supreme court of the United States comes to the rescue of a free press. Unanimously the nine justices ruled that the Louisiana law imposing a punitive tax on the advertising of the principal newspapers of that state is unconstitutional. The law was passed by a legislature controlled by the late Senator Huey Long. The court said of it:

"It is bad because, in the light of its history and of its present setting, it is seen to be a deliberate and calculated device in the guise of a tax to limit the circulation of information to which the public is entitled in virtue of the constitutional guarantee.

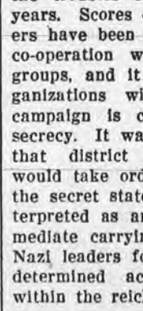
"A free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the government and the people. To allow it to be fettered is to fetter ourselves.

"In view of the persistent search for new subjects of taxation, it is not without significance that, with the single exception of the Louisiana statute, so far as we can discover, no state during the 150 years of our national existence has undertaken to impose a tax like that now in question.

"The form in which the tax is imposed is in itself suspicious. It is not measured or limited by the volume of advertisement. It is measured alone by the extent of the circulation of the publication in which the advertisements are carried, with the plain purpose of penalizing the publishers and curtailing the circulation of a selected group of newspapers."

LETTERS have been sent by President Roosevelt to the heads of the Latin-American governments inviting them to participate in a Pan-American conference, probably in Washington, the purpose of which will be to organize the peace machinery of the western hemisphere. Our State department says the meeting will endeavor to provide means for adjusting internatinonal disputes by peaceful means. The conference may bring up the Monroe Doctrine for a new definition through multilateral endorsement.

PRESIDENT WILLIAM L. RANSOM of the American Bar assocation, with headquarters in Chicago, announced that Newton D. Baker, former secretary of war, has accepted the chairmanship of the association's special committee on co-operation between the press, radio and bar against publicity interfering with fair trial of judicial and quasi-judicial proceedings.



N. D. Baker

The creation of this special committee to define standards to be recommended to lawyers, newspapers and radio broadcasters in the matter of publicity as to court trials, said the announcement, is an outcome of the incidents arising in the course of the Bruno Hauptmann trial and various proceedings before governmental boards and bodies, "and it is hoped that such standards can be made effective through rules of court or through legislation."

ACCORDING to the London Daily Herald, a secret decree providing for expulsion of all Jews from Germany as rapidly as possible has been prepared by Nazi leaders and laid before Chancellor Hitler for his signature. The paper said the decree provided for the confiscation of all property of expelled Jews.

This story may not be true, but there is no doubt that Hitler and his associates are determined to extirpate all the organizations and groups which they consider in opposition to the Nazi regime, and Hitler himself has declared the Jews are to blame for all the troubles of the reich in recent years. Scores of Catholic youth leaders have been arrested, charged with co-operation with illegal Communist groups, and it is predicted their organizations will be dissolved. The campaign is carried on with great secrecy. It was announced in Berlin that district governors henceforth would take orders from the Gestapo, the secret state police. This was interpreted as an indication of an immediate carrying out of promises by Nazi leaders for more ruthless, more determined action against enemies within the reich.

PRESIDENT LAZARO CARDENAS of Mexico went to Monterrey to investigate a stoppage of business and industry in protest against labor troubles attributed to Communists. He issued this ultimatum: "Employers who are fatigued by Mexico's social and economic struggle can turn over their industries to the workers or the government—that would be patriotic. But stoppage of activities cannot be countenanced."

AMERICA'S delegates to the naval conference in London consented to an agreement that would bind this country for five years or more to refrain from building any more cruisers in excess of 8,000 tons in size. When the news reached Washington there was immediate and loud protest in congress against what was termed a "colossal blunder."

High ranking navy officials refused to comment officially upon the London agreement, but said privately that any program which does not include the co-operation of Japan and Germany would be a failure.

Any agreement will not affect the navy's present building program, these officials pointed out, and they refused to be alarmed about the prospect of future limitations.

TRIAL of the assassins of King Alexander of Jugoslavia at Marseilles came to an end at Aix-en-Provence, France, with verdicts of guilty for the six defendants. For three of the band of Croats, members of the secret Ustachi society, who were apprehended, mercy was recommended and they were given sentences of life imprisonment in French Guiana. The others, who never were caught, were sentenced to death. One of the latter is Dr. Ante Pavelich, reputed head of the Ustachi.

ELMER B. O'HARA, Democratic state chairman of Michigan and former clerk of Wayne county, which includes Detroit; State Senator A. J. Wilkowski and 16 others of lesser prominence were convicted in Detroit of having attempted to steal the 1934 election. Eight defendants in the recount case, which had been on trial for nearly 12 weeks, were acquitted. Two other defendants previously had pleaded guilty, thus bringing to 20 the number facing sentence for their part in the vote recount conspiracy.

Elmer B. O'Hara

For O'Hara, the verdict came as the culmination of a series of calamities in a brief political career. Last November a jury in Macomb county, adjacent to Wayne, found him guilty of bribery in a drainage transaction in connection with real estate deals he had made before 1932 when he entered politics and was elected Wayne county clerk. He awaits sentence under that conviction. After conviction he was removed from office.

In the recount case O'Hara was found guilty on three counts, permitting others to alter ballots, conspiring to permit others to alter ballots, and conspiring to permit others to conduct the recount in an unlawful manner and change the result of the November, 1934, election by putting Democrats in office instead of the Republicans elected.

LEADERS of congress hope for an early adjournment, by May 1 at the latest, and therefore they pushed the new farm bill forward, trying to get it through both houses without much delay. In their desire to get away from the Capital, they already had decided to let the proposed permanent neutrality legislation go by the board.

The farm bill as rewritten by the senate agriculture committee is based on the soil erosion prevention scheme. Some Democrats joined with many Republicans in opposing the measure, one of them being Senator Walsh of Massachusetts. In a statement issued to the press he declared it was a "dangerous" bill conferring "autocratic and blanket authority" on the secretary of agriculture. He said the measure was "neither valid in law nor valid in economics."

Chairman Doughton of the house ways and means committee said he expected definite word from the White House or treasury soon on the amount and kind of taxes that might be imposed to finance the new farm program.

Speaker Byrns said he could see no reason why the tax measure should not emerge from the committee by the end of February.

ACTION against John J. Raskob, former chairman of the Democratic national committee when Al Smith was the Presidential nominee, and who is now president of the American Liberty league, has been begun by the government for an alleged deficiency of $1,026,340 on his 1929 income taxes. The claim was filed in an amendment to the petition recently filed against Pierre S. du Pont two days before Al Smith had bitterly assailed the New Deal. In the petition, which Raskob described as "New Deal persecution," Mr. du Pont was alleged to have understated his 1929 income by $2,897,832 and an additional tax of $617,316 was asked. In the amended petition accusing Mr. Raskob, it was alleged that he and the industrialist engaged in "fictitious" sales of securities, one to the other, to a total of about $30,000,000 for the purpose of showing losses.

MRS. HUEY P. LONG, widow of the slain senator from Louisiana, took her seat in the senate to complete Huey's unfinished term, becoming the second woman member of the upper house. After eleven months she will be succeeded by Allen Allender, speaker of the Louisiana house of representatives, who was nominated for the regular term.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

FAMOUS WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington.—Federal taxes are now running at the rate of about $8,000,000,000 a year, with assurance they will be increased, some at this session of congress, more to follow. State and local taxes are running at the rate of about $9,000,000,000 a year. So that the present tax burden of the United States is about $17,000,000,000 a year, with a certainty that it will be larger before it is smaller!

The figures, not the prophecy, have been compiled by experts of the Department of Commerce. They have not been put in the form of a finished report as yet, but the gist of them has been passed along to Treasury department officials and administration leaders on Capitol Hill now working on the present tax problem.

The startling fact is that this makes the average tax for every man, woman and child in the United States $134 a year. But this counts people on relief, dependents whose relatives are too proud to let them go on relief, and a number of other classes which pay far below their average of taxes.

Even the folks on relief pay some taxes, of course, as for instance the federal tax of six cents a package on cigarettes, perhaps a little liquor tax now and then, or even occasionally the ten cents a pack on playing cards.

But when it is considered that 20,000,000 people, roughly, are on relief, and that most of them contribute very little in the way of taxes, the average of $134 per person should be marked up considerably—far more than the very heavy taxes paid by the rich would pull down the average paid by the middle class folks.

There is no scientific way of computing this, but probably the average paid by each member of of the self-supporting family is not far from $200 a year. Which means that father contributes an average of something like $500 to $1,000 in taxes, whether he knows it or not, of which his income tax is a very small fraction indeed unless father's income goes well up in the surtaxes. In which case, of course, he will be paying a good deal more.

What Smith Hit At

That is the sort of thing Al Smith was hitting at in his Liberty league speech, when he said that it was no use thinking of paying this bill for governmental expenditures by taxing the rich, because the rich simply did not have that much.

Interest rates play an important part in this "redistribution of wealth" program, which is going on as surely as though the administration at Washington, and for that matter the administrations in the 48 state capitals, the thousands of city halls, and the thousands of counties throughout the land, were all committed to the Huey Long share the wealth plan.

The middle class home owner who has a mortgage, recently placed or renewed, is saving a little on interest. The government has been fairly successful in reducing interest rates. But he is getting 2 per cent or less, instead of 4 per cent, on his savings bank account, and the dividends that reduce his life insurance premium or buy additional insurance are smaller. The insurance companies cannot obtain the return on their money that they did before the slash in interest rates.

Meanwhile, just as prosperity seems to be returning, the prospects of the folks just above this level for bigger income from dividends on their invested savings—or inheritances—is jeopardized by prospects that the next big step in taxes—not the one now in contemplation for this year—will probably take another chunk of corporation earnings. Most New Dealers want the present 15 per cent slice the government takes of corporation net earnings boosted to 25 per cent.

Labor Takes Stand

A suggestion that John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, replace Vice President Garner as President Roosevelt's running mate this fall is of course absurd, but under the suggestion is one of the most significant developments in the history of organized labor in the United States. The endorsement of the Roosevelt administration, lock, stock and barrel, by the United Mine Workers, and their arraignment of the American Liberty league as a group of labor oppressers, is far more significant than is generally realized.

For it is not just the mine workers—it is the new movement in organized labor. When the attack on the Liberty league was made every man voting for it was thinking of the Du Ponts and John Raskob in terms of General Motors. It is those big industries, now unorganized, which open such shining doors of hope for highly increased union dues, and power.

So that, as political observers view the situation here, it is the New Deal in labor that is backing up the Roosevelt New Deal. Of the two objectives of the labor leaders in sympathy with Lewis and against the policies of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, one seems sure of attainment, the other very much beclouded.

The actual labor objective, the substitution of vertical unions—unions embracing all the employees of one industry—seems fairly well assured by the trend of events. It is no secret that the heads of at least one of the very large companies at present non-unionized is perfectly willing to have a union of its workers—providing it is one union. The executives of this company do not want to be bothered with 30 or 40 different sets of union officials. Particularly they do not want to have strikes caused by friction between different unions in their organization.

See Chance for Victory

Henry Ford, General Motors and Chrysler may be forced to accept such a union. The Lewis crowd believes its chances of victory here, and in the steel industry and the electric industry, will be much greater under Roosevelt than under anyone the Republicans might nominate.

But some very astute labor leaders, who for obvious reasons are not putting out their necks at the present moment, think the mixture of politics with the fight for vertical unions is highly unfortunate. They believe that the whole cause of labor may suffer a serious setback due to the stampede to the Roosevelt band-wagon by the United Mine Workers—a stampede which of course will include all other unions sympathetic with the Lewis goal.

For, as can be demonstrated by any search of the records, organized labor has a very poor batting average in political campaigns in this country. The record is so poor, even in strong industrial sections, that it is perfectly obvious the individual members of unions, when they enter the polling booths, vote just as they please individually and seldom if ever accord first place among the motives actuating them to the recommendations of their leaders.

To hear politicians speak in public, one would never think they suspected this, but actually they know it perfectly well. Actually if there is a politician in Washington who really thinks that the chances for re-election of President Roosevelt have been affected by the United Mine Workers' endorsement, he is pretty well hidden. Privately all agree that the endorsement and the pep talks bound to follow will throw a few votes, perhaps even a considerable number of votes, to Roosevelt. But they also think that an equal number will be alienated.

More About Taxes

What taxes will be levied at this session of congress—or more accurately—what taxes will be levied before election, depends upon whether President Roosevelt definitely decides to accept the Liberty league challenge, give up all hope of the "stockholder vote," and put all the burden on corporation profits.

Conviction among his advisers is that the President will seek to raise, at this session, about $700,000,000. That is approximately the amount needed to make up for the loss of the processing taxes and to pay interest on the sinking fund for amortization of the soldier bonus. (In this connection it makes almost no difference to the Treasury department whether it pays interest on the bonus taken by the soldiers, and eventually pays them off, or whether the soldiers cash their bonds, in which case the treasury borrows the money at about the same rate of interest the bonds carry).

Up until the last few days most of his advisers were convinced that the President would insist on this money's being raised by excise taxes. These would be very similar to the processing taxes just outlawed by the Supreme court, but spread over a wider base so as to get the $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 additional needed, and adjusted so as to avoid some of the particular hardships and difficulties of the processing taxes.

This is still the probability, but recently another angle has developed. Some of the President's advisers are urging that he oppose any such excise taxes on the ground that, being taxes for the most part on the poor, they will tend to flare up popular resentment among the very small income people against the extravagant spending at Washington.

Very Little Loss

Which, they point out, is very little loss at all, because, as illustrated by the Liberty league, a considerable percentage of this type of voters is against the re-election of Roosevelt anyhow. Therefore, they argue, why not turn from the "haves" and go all the way in trying to get the votes of the "have nots," especially as the "have nots" have more votes?

Advocates of this course have another string to their bow. They point out that everyone who studies the government's financial standing at all knows that the tax plan to be pushed through at this session is not seeking to balance the budget, but merely to make up for two losses—the processing taxes and the additional cost of the soldier bonus.

So that, they contend, the stockholders of the country, who might be calculated to resent another boost in the corporation income levy, are fearful that if Roosevelt is re-elected he will do that anyhow, after election. Hence they would be inclined to vote against Roosevelt to prevent that from happening.

Physician Reports That Air Is Germless 20,000 Feet Up

The atmosphere above the altitude of 20,000 feet is "sterile," a Baltimore physician reported to the chief of staff of the Army Air corps after a record airplane flight, observes a Washington United Press correspondent.

It was the first time in aviation history that a test was conducted above 20,000 feet to determine if bacteria were present. The highest altitude reached was 28,000 feet. Never before had cultures been taken at this height.

SYNOPSIS

John Spencer and his cousin, Geoffrey Bohun, are vacationing in Austria. Geoffrey is a gifted portrait painter but prefers to paint landscapes. While strolling in the forest, John hears English voices, and decides to investigate. From safe cover he finds four men burying a man in green livery who, evidently, had been murdered. Pharaoh is the leader of the gang; the others are Dewdrop, Rush and Bugle. Unfortunately, John makes himself known to the assassins by dropping a letter with his name and address on it. He tells Geoffrey and his chauffeur, Barley, of his adventure. Geoffrey, realizing that John's life is in danger, declares he must vanish. Spencer discovers that the livery of the murdered man corresponds to the livery of the servants of Yorick castle, and tells Countess Heiena, mistress of the castle, what he had seen. With Geoffrey and Barley, John starts for Annabel, a nearby village. They encounter Pharaoh. In making their getaway they exchange shots with the gang, without serious result. They arrive at Plumage farm, on the Yorick estate, where Lady Helena had requested John and his cousin to meet her. She reveals to them that her father had converted his immense fortune into gold sovereigns and hidden them away in a secret vault in the castle. Knowing that his son, Valentine, Helena's brother, was incapable of controlling the fortune, he had revealed it to Helena alone just before his death. In some manner the news had leaked out, and Pharaoh is after the treasure.

The warden lifted his head and looked me full in the eyes. Then he turned his head to his mistress and looked at her. Though he never spoke, he seemed to ask her some question, for after a moment she nodded and looked away.

With his hand still in mine, the warden went down on one knee.

"Your servant, sir," he said quietly. And then, "I am very grateful, sir. I cannot say more. But I beg you will be careful. My son will not rest in his grave if you come to hurt."

Then he rose and turned to his mistress, and when she had smiled and nodded, he bowed to her and to me and left the room.

As the door closed behind him—

"He shouldn't have knelt," said I.

Helena shrugged her shoulders.

"That's his affair. But please tell no one he did so. You and he and I know, and that's enough."

Upon a sudden impulse, I put out my hand for hers. She gave it to me gravely enough. Then I went down on one knee and put the cool, slight fingers up to my lips. . . .

As she caught her breath—

"Your servant," I said quietly, "and you may tell whom you please."

* * * * * * *

Eight hours had gone by, and I was sitting at Villach, in the driver's seat of the Rolls. My cousin was on the platform, but the car was berthed in the shadows, perhaps a hundred yards from the station's door.

The train from Salzburg steamed out.

As its rumble faded, I saw a flash from a lamp, and thirty seconds later I drew up beside the pavement where Geoffrey and Barley stood.

Without a word being spoken our baggage was lifted aboard, and as Barley climbed in among it, my cousin sat down by my side.

"Let her go, John."

Two minutes later the Rolls stole out of town. . . .

Ten miles on we pulled up by the side of the road.

I felt my cousin nudge me. Then he lifted his voice.

"Anything to report, Barley?"

The answer came pat.

"No, sir. Nothing at all."

My cousin sat very still. Then he slewed himself round in his seat.

"That's strange," he said. "I'd half an idea that you might perhaps have seen someone—someone you thought you knew."

"No, sir," said Barley, firmly. "No one at all."

"Look here," said Geoffrey, "before you left—"

A desperate voice cut him short.

"Could I see you alone, sir, a moment?"

"You can speak the truth here and now. Mr. Spencer isn't going. We're all three going to stay."

"Very good, sir. Then I seen Pharaoh. And Dewdrop beside. I'll swear it was them. In Salzburg: this afternoon. Come out of the station, they did, as I walked in."

CHAPTER III

On Patrol.

If Barley's news had given us something to go on, it pointed the wisdom of acting without delay. This for two very good reasons. In the first place, Salzburg for Pharaoh was dangerous ground, for anyone moving in Salzburg must plainly be under the hand of the Salzburg police: if, therefore, we could find him and then arouse suspicion sufficient to have him detained, although he might put up a fight, his race was as good as run. Secondly, it seemed pretty certain that Pharaoh had split his force and that Rush and the fourth of the rogues were yet in the countryside: and that meant that if we could find them, we should only have two men to deal with, and those very ordinary thieves. (And here I will say that since I afterwards learned that the fourth rogue was known as Bugle, from now on it will be convenient to give him his name.)

I will not set out our discussion of these very obvious points, for fully three hours had gone by before with many misgivings our plans were laid. This may seem something foolish, but it must be remembered that we had a great deal at stake, and the fear of abusing a chance which might not return continually haunted our efforts to make up our minds. In the end, however, we came to certain decisions, and since we stuck to these, I will say what they were.

Early the following morning, Geoffrey and Barley and I were to visit The Reaping Hook: that Bugle and Rush would be gone, we had no doubt, but we had some hope of tracing the damaged car. If this should lead us up to the men we sought, we should at once give battle and do our best to lay the two by the heels: but unless by midday we had picked up some definite clue, then Geoffrey and Barley would leave for Salzburg by train, whilst I remained at Plumage, lying low during the daytime and patrolling the roads about Yorick from dusk to dawn. "And I give you my word," said Geoffrey, "if only you'll mind your step, I think you're more likely to get there than Barley and I. We've got to search a city, and we don't know where to begin. But your field is much more narrow. In the first place, Yorick's a loadstone, and Bugle and Rush will naturally turn that way. . . . But you simply must watch your step. You're out to get information, not to attack. If you find them, you must not strike: lie lown and see them home, and then drive all out for Salzburg and Barley and me. Will you give me your word to do that? And always to be back at Plumage before it's light?"

I gave him my solemn word, but I knew in my heart that he would never have left me if he had thought it likely that I should find Bugle and Rush, and that, though he disliked the idea of my working alone, he was doing his best to choose the lesser evil and to keep me away from Pharaoh at any price.

Thanks to my lady's foresight, we could now send word to Yorick without any waste of time, and before we left the next morning our groom was on his way to the castle, bearing a note from my cousin in which he had set out our plan.

It was barely eight o'clock when we ran into Annabel.

By Geoffrey's direction I stopped the car at cross roads out of sight of The Reaping Hook: then he and Barley descended and walked as far as the forge which was walling one side of the forecourt that graced the inn: and there Geoffrey stood by the corner while Barley walked up to the house.

As luck would have it, a servant was washing the steps, and a word from Barley brought him to Geoffrey's side.

Then my cousin turned and waved, and I brought up the Rolls, for, as we had fully expected, the birds were flown. One minute later we were speaking to the host and his wife. . . .

Now we had had no doubt that the moment we mentioned their late undesirable guests, the two would be only too ready to talk themselves hoarse: but we were not prepared for the spate of incoherence which our casual inquiry unloosed. The two were simply bursting to vent such a volume of grievance as I can only compare to the burden of Christian's sins. Since we were there to listen, there was clearly nothing to do but let the storm blow itself out, and when we had heard them in silence for what seemed a quarter of an hour and had inspected the spots at which violence had been committed or damage done, we ventured to put the questions which we had come to ask.

The strangers were gone.

What was the order of their going and what had become of their car?

Our words might have been a spell.

I have never seen human beings so suddenly change their tune. As though we had turned some tap, the fountain of talk stopped dead: all their excitement died an immediate death, and the two became as crafty and sullen as though we had come to trap them and do them some evil turn.

They had seen nothing at all. One minute the strangers were there, and the next they were gone. They had not seen them go: they knew nothing of any car: when we spoke of its being disabled, they glanced at one another and shook their heads.

"Scared stiff," said Geoffrey shortly, and went off to prove the servants—to no avail.

In silence we returned to the Rolls. "And now for Plumage and Villach. At least, this means we can catch an earlier train."

Four hours later I bade my cousin farewell.

* * * * * * *

Helena glanced at her wrist and folded the map.

We were sitting by the water at Plumage, and had been for half an hour, for when I got back from Villach, a note from my lady was waiting to say that I might expect her at five o'clock.

"Do you think you can find your way?"

"I think so," said I.

"By night, without lights, upon roads that you've never seen?"

I swallowed.

"If I make mistakes, it won't matter. When I've felt my way round twice, I'll know where I am."

"And then?"

"I propose to watch certain points—the turning to Lass, for instance, and the coppice that you call Starlight: that's where the road turns closest to Yorick itself."

"And the car?"

"I'll find some track or other and park her there."

Helena drew in her breath.

"And supposing they're there before you and watch you arrive. . . . They'll let you park the car and steal back to the road. They'll let you pick your position and settle down. . . . And tomorrow at dawn they'll be digging another grave."

"Be honest," said I, laughing. "Why on earth should Rush and his fellow be watching these roads?"

"I don't care," said Helena swiftly. "It isn't a one-man job. Mr. Bohun must be out of his mind. Will you take Sabre with you? At least, he'll give you warning if anyone else is at hand."

"I will, indeed," said I.

"What time are you leaving here?"

"About ten o'clock," said I.

"D'you think you can find the mouth of the entrance drive?"

"I can hardly miss that," said I.

"Sabre shall be there tonight at a quarter past ten."

I laid myself back on the turf.

"And I'm not to thank you," I said. "I stay at your house: I ride your horses: and now I'm to have your dog. As partnerships go, it seems to be rather one-sided."

"That," said my lady, "is foolish. What am I doing that, if you were placed as I am, you wouldn't be glad to do?"

"That ought to be the answer," said I.

She was sitting sideways, propping herself on an arm: and either because of her pose or because her hair was tumbled, she seemed no more the fine lady, but only a beautiful child.

Suddenly I knew that I was in love.

* * * * * * *

That night was very dark, and I would have given a lot to have seen but once by daylight the roads that I was to patrol: quite apart from picking my way, I could see no track or turning until I was actually there.

It follows that after ten minutes the only idea I had left was to get to where Sabre was waiting at the mouth of the castle drive: and this, after great tribulation, I found about half-past ten. I overran it, of course. However, I knew I was right, so I stopped the engine and listened and then stepped into the road.

I was hastening back in the shadows when I suddenly found that something was moving beside me, and then, before I could think, the Alsatian was licking my hand.

At once I turned, to make my way back to the car, but the dog did not turn with me and when I put my hand on his collar, he would not move.

I had not begun my patrol: the Rolls was out in the open: and Sabre refused to move. If he would not come. . . .

I perceived that the first thing to do was to get the Rolls off the road. If Rush and Bugle were out—

Far in the distance I heard the drone of a car.

For an instant I stood spell-bound. Then I was out in the road and was whipping back to the Rolls. . . .

Before I started the engine, I listened again, to hear on the road behind me the footfalls of somebody running, but lightly shod. Then—

The Drone of the Car Was Louder

"In you go, Sabre," said Helena, opening a door.

As the dog leaped in, she took the seat by my side.

"A hundred yards on," she panted. "As quick as you can. There's a track on the right. I'll show you."

The drone of the car was louder—some car on the road ahead.

As the Rolls gathered speed—

"Now," said Helena. "Steady." I set a foot on the brake. "Put on your lights for an instant. . . . There you are."

As I left the road for the track, the drone of the car approaching turned into a snarl.

I stopped the engine and flung myself out of the Rolls.

"Stay here," I cried, and darted back to the bushes that were edging the side of the road.

The car was close now, and her headlights were on: but even as she passed me, her driver lowered his lights and slackened his speed.

Newspapers Are Useful
A Leisure Class, Also A Real American
Offense and Defense

The Supreme court says: "The free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the government and the people. To let it be fettered is to fetter ourselves." Certainly; the newspaper is to a nation what speech is to an individual, and it is to the crowd what a looking glass is to the individual. History will judge a people by its newspapers, its laws, its theaters, and it will have reason to criticize us.

Arthur Brisbane

Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, repeating what Aristotle said before him, said civilization needs a leisure class, and defined as the "leisure class" those that keep a hired girl.

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, thoughtful and wise, improves that definition; a leisure class for her is made up of individuals that "have sufficient economic security and sufficient leisure to find opportunity for a variety of satisfactions in life."

Charles Fourier, French philosopher, said it long ago, and elaborately. Henry Ford said it well, advocating a short work week, with two days off, that men might have time to spend pleasantly the earnings of five days.

All that will come, and more. In the past men worked too hard, while paid and fed too little, and never dreamed of Mrs. Roosevelt's "varied satisfactions," while the prosperous, as a rule, concentrated too much on foolish satisfactions.

All that knew him learn with sorrow of the sudden death of Charles Curtis, former Vice President of the United States. He was an American, a real one, proud of the red Indian blood in his veins. As a boy he rode horse races well and honestly; as a man, he rode the political race fairly. As Vice President he was content with the position that the American people and Constitution gave him. He would have made a good and loyal President had destiny so willed it.

The newspaper heading, "Britain is redoubling her defense plans to offset Germany," should interest somebody in America. This country is not planning to "offset Germany," but it has all Europe, including Russia and all Asia, to think about in these flying days. We should perfect our "defense plans" and particularly our attack plans. Then we should ask the world to look over our equipment and realize that it would be foolish to attack.

Senator Pittman of Nevada sees Japan shutting us out of China, "even at the risk of war"; says our business men "have been run out of Manchuria already." Japan might reply that her workingmen have been run out of the United States.

The map will comfort Senator Pittman. Gigantic Manchukuo, bigger than all of old Japan, leans up against Outer Mongolia and Soviet Russia. Japan will not invite trouble with those countries, and war with the United States would invite it.

If you wonder "where all the tax money goes," read this:

"In six months the state of New York paid $801,612 for official automobile expense."

And that does not include automobiles for the department of mental hygiene. One official discharged his chauffeur, paid by taxpayers, accusing him of cheating the state out of $2,000 in one year through dishonest gasoline and repair vouchers. That is almost "a business."

"Charlie" Schwab may be seventy years old, but he still "knows his way around." The government tried to get $19,654,856 from Schwab's Bethlehem Steel company, alleging profiteering. Instead of giving the government $19,000,000, the "special master," hearing evidence, says the government must pay $5,666,154 to Schwab and Bethlehem Steel. No wonder Carnegie, who was Scotch, thought a good deal of Schwab.

Dr. G. A. Stevenson, "fellow" in the University college of Oxford, suggests to the London Times that the pax Romana ("Roman peace") of ancient times, when Rome ruled the world and would allow no fighting, should be followed now by a pax Britannica ("British peace"), England ruling the world, telling everybody what to do.

American Olympic athletes appearing on the field in Germany met with gloomy silence, contrasting with applause for European and Oriental Olympic squads. The Americans, who defeated Germany at hockey, score 1 to 0, will survive the silence. Had they been wiser, they would have stayed at home. A German-Jewish player, Rudi Ball, by the way, was the star hockey player for the Germans.

Status of Alien Who Has Taken Out "First Papers"

The "first papers" are simply a declaration of the alien's intention of becoming an American citizen. The declaration gives him no right, privilege, or duties of American citizenship, nor does it deprive him of any of his rights as a citizen of another country.

He cannot be conscripted by the United States, and he is entitled to the protection of his mother country until he renounces allegiance to that country at the time his petition for naturalization is granted—that is, at the time he gets his "second papers."

NO UPSETS

The proper treatment for a bilious child

A cleansing dose today; a smaller quantity tomorrow; less each time, until bowels need no help at all.

ANY mother knows the reason when her child stops playing, eats little, is hard to manage. Constipation. But what a pity so few know the sensible way to set things right!

The ordinary laxatives, of even ordinary strength, must be carefully regulated as to dosage.

A liquid laxative is the answer, mothers. The answer to all your worries over constipation. A liquid can be measured. The dose can be exactly suited to any age or need. Just reduce the dose each time, until the bowels are moving of their own accord and need no help.

This treatment will succeed with any child and with any adult.

The doctors use liquid laxatives. Hospitals use the liquid form. If it is best for their use, it is best for home use. The liquid laxative most families use is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Any druggist has it.

Milnesia Wafers come in bottles of 20 and 48, at 35c and 60c respectively, and in convenient tins for your handbag containing 12 at 20c. Each wafer is approximately one adult dose of milk of magnesia. All good drug stores sell and recommend them.

New Ideas From Knit-Crochet Realm

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

WHEN is the psychological moment to "tend to your knitting"? Right now, between seasons. The peaceful aftermath of a maddening, whirling, swirling, dizzying, hectic holiday rush, the blissful, mid-season lull betwixt the lingering farewell of winter and the none-too-hurried advent of spring—'tis "opportunity knocking at the door" of eager knitters and crocheters.

Yes, indeed, it's full time to begin to purl one, knit one, chain-stitch here and chain-stitch there, if you would be having in readiness a collection of pretty wearables to enhance the forthcoming spring and summer wardrobe. If you are needing fresh ideas to whet your enthusiasm, the illustration offers several of the very newest in the realm of things knitted and crocheted.

A sunning blouse! We agree with you. What with its high rolled collar which chucks under the chin with unmistakable chic, its unique yoke, its novel bib front, and its crochet-cord-edged short sleeves the ever-coveted "something different" is achieved with emphasis. It is knitted of a very likable knitting-and-crochet cotton which comes in heavenly colors. Yes (reading the query on the tip of your tongue) the answer is in the affirmative, it washes to perfection.

Just what you'll be wanting—a frilled jabot to go gracefully cascading down the front of your dark daytime dresses. The one pictured is easy to make, easy to wear and a gladsome sight to appreciative eyes. It should be slightly starched to give it its flare.

Hat and gloves? To be sure, and aren't they nifty? A mere matter of a few leisure half hours, a ball or so of knit-crochet cotton in the color you like best, nimble fingers and a will to dare, and these charming accessories will be your reward.

The little close-fitting hat speaks eloquently in terms of the now-so-voguish popcorn stitch. The tall peak is along lines of smartest fashion since the newest millinery gesture trends to extreme height. The beauty of the knit-crochet cotton which is used for its making is, that being strong and firm it assures a hat that will stay in shape, will not be hot and scratchy and, best of all, it will come from a tubbing looking as good as new. It is an extremely young and engaging creation.

The lacy gloves crocheted of mercerized cotton succeed in "running the gauntlet" halfway and more up to the elbow. Which means you have to keep on keeping on crocheting for quite some time in order to arrive at just the right point.

A highly interesting bit of news in regard to things crocheted comes from Paris. We refer to the fanciful little tri-cornered shawl-scarf, which being of peasant inspiration is as quaint and colorful as can be. These are proving wonderfully popular and picturesque as worn at resorts this winter. With every shawl-scarf there's a hat, either a straw capelline crowned with matching crochet or else a small beret or turban.

CHIC BIRD PRINT

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The new prints are a revelation in the way of original and most out-of-the-ordinary patternings. Imagine bars of music notes printed all over your first spring silk, or a design using postage stamp motif and there are any number of ideas that could be cited just as unique. There are the flying-bird prints as they are called, for example, such as pictured here. In the print illustrated, white love birds with bright colored heads fly across a navy blue background to form a striking design for a dinner suit of woolly textured silk. The bodice is of white silk matching the lining of the jacket.

SANDALS WITH SILK GOWNS FOR TRAVEL

Silk dresses in white, in pastels, or in gay prints are tops for luncheons, cocktails or for wear at special stop-offs on cruises—a fashion that definitely calls for sandals. Whether in white linen, white patent leather (a very smart and different note), or in white suede, the sandal shown in the photo has a place in every traveler's wardrobe. It is extremely graceful on the foot, fits beautifully and should be regarded as a "must" in cruise shoes.

For snooty shindigs, where the gala dress of black or white chiffon is correct, and for the more formal cruise occasions, a smart shoe store has created the "corsage" kid sandals in delicately flowered design.

Slender Effect Achieved by Stem-Like Silhouette

A stemlike silhouette making mannequins look slim as a reed, mark the new fashions launched by Roger Worth, new president of the famous old dressmaking house of that name and great-grandson of its founder.

Both day frocks and coats are built on slender lines, their only variation being occasional big sleeves which balance the straight narrow skirt.

Black, violet, wine red and navy afternoon frocks of satin, crepe or faconne silk are generally designed with high necklines and finished with a variety of gold touches. Gold embroidery or gold tipped tassels marks belts, which are sometimes slightly lowered, while necklines are draped into gold metal loops or accented by a cluster of gold coins swinging from silk cords.

Elegant Blouse

The tea-time blouse may be made of a variety of lovely fabrics—brocade, metal cloth, chiffon or lustrous silk. It is usually designed tunic-style and may be worn with a velvet skirt or with a plain cloth suit skirt.

Lesson for February 23

PEOPLE BEFORE PROPERTY

LESSON TEXT—Luke 8:26-37.

GOLDEN TEXT — No servant can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.—Luke 16:13.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus With His Friends in a Storm.

JUNIOR TOPIC — Jesus With His Friends in a Storm.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Sympathy or Selfishness?

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Human Welfare Before Financial Profit.

After his teaching by the parable of the soil and the lighted candle, Jesus exhibited his credentials, enforcing his teaching by demonstrations of his mighty power.

I. Jesus Calming the Storm (vv. 22-25).

In this miracle he demonstrated his power over nature.

1. Jesus asleep (v. 23). While the disciples were sailing the ship the Master fell asleep.

2. The frightened disciples (vv. 23, 24). The storm seems to have been an unusual one. These sturdy men were used to storms, but as their ship was being filled with water they awoke Jesus with their cry of fear.

3. Jesus rebuked the wind and water (v. 24). At his word there was a great calm. We can with confidence put our trust in Jesus Christ.

4. Jesus rebuked the disciples (v. 25). After rebuking the raging elements, he turned to the disciples. He did not rebuke them for waking him, but for their lack of faith.

II. Jesus Casting Out Demons (vv. 26-39).

In this mighty act Jesus' power over demons was demonstrated. Demon possession was in that day, and it is today, an awful reality. The characteristics are often similar to cases of insanity, and many are called insane, who are really demon-possessed.

1. Jesus met by the demoniac (vv. 26-29). This poor man's suffering was dreadful. He abode in the tombs without clothing. At the sight of Jesus he made an outcry and fell down before him and besought him not to torment him. There is no doubt in the mind of demons as to the reality of a place of torment.

2. Jesus' question (v. 30). He asked him, "What is thy name?" His purpose was to bring the real man to consciousness, to enable him to distinguish between himself and the demon who held him. The answer shows that the man thought his case was hopeless. He said, "Legion," which meant that many demons had entered into him.

3. The demons' request (vv. 31, 32). They asked permission to enter into a herd of swine.

4. Their request granted (vv. 32, 33). Just why this was done we do not know. Since Jesus did it, we must believe that it was right and wise.

5. The effect upon the people (vv. 34-37).

a. The keepers of the swine went and made it known in the city and country.

b. The people made investigation. They saw the man sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed and in his right mind, and heard the testimony of those who had seen what was done.

c. The multitude besought Jesus to depart from them. How sad it is that in the face of the mighty works of Jesus men will not open their hearts to him.

6. The request of the healed man (vv. 38, 39). He desired to be with Jesus. This was natural and right, but his responsibility was to go home and show to the people there what great things God had done for him.

III. Jesus' Power Over Disease (vv. 43-48).

Jesus heals a woman with an issue of blood. Observe:

1. Her helpless condition (v. 43). She had been a great sufferer for twelve long years (Mark 5:26).

2. Her faith (v. 44). Her faith was demonstrated by pressing her way through the thronging multitude.

3. Her confession (v. 47). She thought furtively to get the blessing, but Jesus had her make a public confession.

4. Christ's words of encouragement (v. 48). He told her that it was her faith, not her touch, that saved her, and bade her go in peace.

IV. Jesus Raises the Dead (vv. 40-42; 50-56).

1. Jairus' request (vv. 40-42). His only daughter lay dying. He besought Jesus to come to his house.

2. Jairus informed of his daughter's death (v. 49).

3. Jesus' assurance (v. 50).

4. The skeptical mourners (51-53).

5. The daughter raised (vv. 54-56).

A Harsh Word

To be silent, to suffer, to pray whenever I cannot act, is acceptable to God. A disappointment, a contradiction, a harsh word received, and endured as in his presence, is worth more than a long prayer.

Our Relation to God

Vice and virtue chiefly imply the relation of our actions to men in this world; sin and holiness rather imply their relation to God and the other world.

POULTRY FACTS

SOY BEANS MAKE POULTRY RATION

Meal Is Satisfactory Protein Supplement.

By H. H. Alp, Poultry Extension Specialist, University of Illinois.—WNU Service.

Soy bean oil meal is a satisfactory protein supplement for the poultry ration if the ration also contains sufficient mineral.

For growth and egg production soy bean oil meal, supplemented with sufficient minerals of the right kinds, is about equal to meat scraps and fish meal, somewhat better than tankage, gluten feed and cottonseed meal, and not quite as good as dry milk products.

Both soy beans, fed whole or ground, and soy bean oil meal must be supplemented with sufficient minerals. The minerals needed are calcium, phosphorus, sodium and chlorine. These can be supplied by a mineral mixture containing 2 per cent bone meal, 1 per cent ground limestone and 1 per cent salt.

For laying hens the following mash containing soy bean oil meal has been found satisfactory: 160 pounds ground yellow corn, 100 pounds wheat bran, 100 pounds ground oats, 50 pounds meat scrap, 50 pounds soy bean oil meal, 40 pounds alfalfa leaf meal, 10 pounds steamed bone meal, 5 pounds ground limestone or oyster shell and 5 pounds salt. The grain mixture suggested is one-half corn and one-quarter each of wheat and oats or barley.

Whole soy beans are not very satisfactory, since they contain a large amount of oil which makes it necessary to feed them sparingly. Because of this high fat content, ground beans may become rancid during warm weather. The value of whole soy beans as poultry feed does not measure up to that of commercial soy bean oil meal. Another factor to be considered where beans form a large part of the ration is that flocks do not relish the taste of beans until accustomed to this type of feed.

Stone Age Heater Good to Warm Poultry House

Michigan State college men have gone all the way back to the Stone age to find an economical way to heat poultry houses and small greenhouses. The work has been done where winter temperatures make heat in laying houses profitable, observes the Country Home.

Their heater is made of an empty oil drum and a pile of stones. A fire door is cut in one end of the drum and a hole for the smoke pipe in the other, and the oil drum is placed on its side on a bed of sand or masonry. A blanket of stones from 12 to 18 inches thick is then placed around the sides and over the top of the drum. The stove is fired with wood; when the stones about the oil drum become thoroughly heated, they will radiate warmth for hours. In temperatures as low as 30 degrees below zero, it has not been necessary to fire the stove later than nine o'clock at night to furnish ample heat in the poultry house until the next morning. One winter's experience in heating a 10-by-19-foot greenhouse was also entirely successful.

Trapnest Is Best Test

Trapnesting being to the laying flock what the scale and Babcock test are to the dairy herd, it is the only means of accurately determining the production of the individual hen. At the Cape Rouge experimental station, says the Montreal Herald, the hens are selected by the trapnesting method and the poor layers are marketed after their first year's laying. Hatching eggs are selected from high producers, and should weigh at least 24 ounces per dozen. Unthrifty chicks, and cockerels except those from the best hens are marketed. The pullets which are strong, vigorous, healthy and active, which have a large, deep head, stout beak, and large, bright prominent eyes are kept, while the birds which are unthrifty or unhealthy, which have a crow head, long, shallow beak or small, sunken eyes, or are off-types are eliminated.

Poultry Lore

Water is an important factor in the production of winter eggs.

One hundred pullets should eat about 25 pounds of feed daily.

An older and more popular dish than either peacock, goose, or turkey, is the homely duck.

Thinness in poultry indicates lack of proper feed or inability to digest what they eat.

In the Canton, China, district there are duck farms that carry as many as 3,000 ducks on one-third of an acre.

Nine pounds of water are required for each dozen eggs laid, according to records recently completed on 60 White Leghorn pullets at the University of Illinois.

In China, which is a land of the most ancient traditions, duck raising for food "has been practiced ever"—as one investigator comprehensively puts it.

To dice or cut marshmallows easily dip a dry scissors into powdered sugar.

Rub equal parts of linseed oil and vinegar well shaken into leather covered chairs, occasionally. It keeps them in good condition.

One teaspoon of chopped maraschino cherries and one tablespoon of orange juice added to boiled salad dressing makes a delicious dressing for fruit salads.

Tie a cheese cloth or paper bag over the mouth of food chopper, when cutting bread, nuts, etc., through it. Every bit will then be saved.

Add one-eighth teaspoon of cream of tartar to cinnamon and sugar used in apple sauce. It gives it a delicious flavor.

If an apple tree is broken by winter storms, pare off the splinters with a sharp knife or chisel and treat the wound with creosote, then give it a coat of linseed oil and lead paint. Do not let the creosote touch the live bark.

Chocolate cake scorches easily on the bottom and sides because of the large percentage of fat it contains. It is therefore necessary to bake it in a moderate oven.

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

As I pointed out once before in this column, there are thousands of boys waiting as well as wanting to become Scouts. Surely these boys have reasons for wanting to be Boy Scouts. Let's see if we can point out a few of the reasons.

When a boy becomes of Scout age, he is also at the age when crime and religion alike recruit their largest numbers. The Scouts aim is to direct him through proper leadership into productive channels. The boy although he doesn't realize this is one of his reasons, after being asked this question, will readily admit it to be a fact. Another of his reasons that he is likely to realize is the vigorous physical life.

Still others: Purposefully filled leisure, which will grip the boys' interest. Useful play activities as one phase of boy expressional life. Outdoor craft to counter the drift of modern city life. Interest enrichment for rural life. Mental growth, information, service through pleasurable activities. Direction of the gang tendencies into socially productive channels. Habit formation that shall be spontaneously moral and social. Democratic and socializing influences which cut squarely across all levels of society. Arousing the thoughts beyond the immediate (the blind alley job after) toward his place in life.

These are the real reasons for a boys' desire to become a Scout. In the heart of every boy, he wants to do what is right, and will if he has the proper leadership.

To have proper leadership, he must be taken into the hands of honest loyal men. Men who have found the good things of life through proper leadership themselves. The Scoutmaster's own youth is renewed thru his association with youth—the real fountain of youth sought by Ponce de Leon. The outdoor life reacts constructively on his own health. The "outdoor crafts" become his own knowledge. He, too, comes to "BE PREPARED." The Scout Oath and Law clarify his own ideals. He, too does "GOOD TURNS". It multiplies his influence in the lives of the troop, his loyal friends and staunch supporters. It discovers to the Scoutmaster his own hidden qualities of leadership, making of him a better "human engineer" in his business. Scouting provides the rare joy of tangible evidence and conscoiusness of results—results too, that are built into human life.

Go to it, Columbiana, you're making plenty racket over there. Keep your chin up and keep fighting and you will stay on top.

Mr. Leonard, you and those two assistants of yours, seem to be about the most active complete group of leaders in the County.

You two Patrol Leaders, Harry Dover and Bill White, give the Pathat's what boys like. And just to that what boys like. And just to show you I am right, I am going to present the Patrol Leader whose Patrol is the most active during the next six weeks, a shining new Handbook for Patrol Leaders. Your Scoutmaster will give you the work to do and keep score on you. Mr. Leonard will you please advise the sort of contest it should be and how points shall be made? Thanks, I knew you would. Now, Mr. Leonard will let me know the winner and get this, in case he calls it a draw both Patrol Leaders will receive the Hand book for Patrol Leaders. I am counting on you fellows, so don't disappoint me.

How about it Vincent Montevallo, Wilton and any other Scout towns in Shelby County. Can't we get up some sort of a contest?

There are several more towns in Shelby County that I want to see organize a Scout Troop, for instance, Shelby, Wilsonville, Helena, Boothton Calera and any where else if you can get enough boys to form a troop and if you can't then organize a Lone Scout Tribe and if you can't make that possible, then send me your own name and I will have National Headquarters send you complete information on "How To Become a Lone Scout."

Top-Dressing Of Oats Increases Production

AUBURN—Farmers can increase their oat production several bushels per acre by top-dressing each acre with 100 pounds of nitrate of soda or nitrate of lime during the first of March. Sulfate of ammonia may be used on lime lands.

In a number of experiments conducted by the Alabama Experiment Station, 100 pounds of nitrate gave an increase of 10 bushels of oats per acre, reports J. C. Lowery, extension agronomist.

Well, we never had winters like this under Coolidge and Hoover.

THOS. H. MAXWELL FOR CONGRESS

Thos. H. Maxwell, of Tuscaloosa Sends A Message To The Voters Of The Sixth Congressional District, State Of Alabama

Thomas H. Maxwell, of Woodbank Farm, RFD No. 1, Tuscaloosa, Alabama, whose announcement for Congress to represent Alabama's Sixth Congressional District, appears in this issue of the Democrat, is the son of a Confederate veteran. He asks for the support, in his race to win the Democratic nomination of all the voters who have "gray in their hair or none-who will cast their first votes on May 5, 1936 and those voters of all ages in between the other two classes."

Mr. Maxwell, in his youth served in the 3rd Regiment of United States Volunteer Engineers in the War against Spain in Cuba. He volunteered again in 1917, and served as Captain of Engineers in France for seventeen months in the war against German autocracy. He is a member of: The United Spanish War Veterans, The American Legion, The Veterans of Foreign Wars, The American Farm Bureau Association, The Reserve Officers Association, and a member of the S. A. E. Fraternity. He makes his home on the Farm near Tuscaloosa where he was born 63 years ago.

His platform includes: a plank providing that the farmer receive more than the cost of production for his produce so that he can spend, and thus help others; a plank providing for adequate pensions for the aged; a plank providing for the United States government whenever it desires to take any of the power stock, pay a fair price to the individual holders of that stock to the end that the investors be not injured.

The new Farm Bill, he states, will be an improvement on those that have been repealed.

Mr. Maxwell asks that his advertisement appearing in the local papers be clipped and preserved, and used in the future to demonstrate his pledges to the people of the 6th Congressional District.

COLLEGE NIGHT IS DUE NEXT WEEK AT MONTEVALLO

MONTEVALLO, Ala.,—As announced last Thursday by President Harman, of Alabama College, the seventeenth annual College Night has been postponed until March 6 and 7, when it will be given at 7:30 p. m. in Palmer Hall. Rehearsals for College Night will be resumed Monday, March 2. Tickets originally for February 21 will be accepted on March 6 and those for the 22nd will be accepted on the 7th.

It was thought by the Administration that the postponement will permit both better attendance and participation on the part of students as well as their visitors.

The program includes sixteen numbers, the last two being the presentation of the gift and the decision of the judges. The leaders are Misses Mary Nell Kendrick and Helen Hewell, and the Assistants, Misses Billie Hill and Aileen Holley. Miss Isabel Henderson, as president of the Student Government Association, will preside.

The Presidential Political parade is getting under way now, with band wagons on every corner. Principal attention is centered on the Republicans, as only a miracle of the first dimension could prevent the renomination of President Roosevelt.

Two candidates for the Republican nomination have already tossed their hats in the ring—Colonel Knox, publisher of the Chicago News, and the famed Senator Borah of Idaho. Governor Landon of Kansas and Mr. Hoover will also be candidates. Some think that the more prominent candidates may off set each other, and lead to the nomination of a "dark horse."

4-H CLUB WORK

Miss Elizabeth DeLoney, the State 4-H Club Agent, of Auburn, was the guest of Miss Marye Elizabeth Nolen Home Demonstration Agent, on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of last week. She assisted in the organization of several 4-H Clubs in the county.

We feel that we are quite fortunate, indeed, to have with us such a charming person. She is most interested in 4-H Club work and has made an outstanding success with it. She is a most attractive person.

On Monday, Miss DeLoney and Miss Nolen attended an executive meeting of the State 4-H Club Council which met at Montevallo. At the lunch hour they were the guests of the College. Those present at the luncheon were: Dr. Minnie L. Steckle, Student Counsellor, Dr. Ackerly, Head of Home Economics, Alabama College, Miss Elizabeth DeLoney, State 4-H Club Agent, Miss Marye Elizabeth Nolen, Home Demonstration Agent, Shelby County, Miss Bernice Pruitt, Home Demonstration Agent, Greene County, Miss Marjorie Miller, President of State 4-H Club Council, Miss Delphine Smith, Secretary, State 4-H Club Council, Miss Frances Traylor, Vice-President State 4-H Club Council; Miss Rachel Hereford, Miss Myrtle Parsons, Miss Frances Kennamer, Miss Julia Minafee, and Miss Blanche LeVert.

Plans were discussed for the short course which is to be held in Auburn in May.

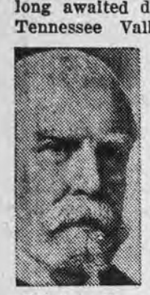
New Deal Wins in Tennessee Valley Case—Picking Delegates for National Conventions—Substitute Farm Bill Pushed to Passage.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

SCORE one for the New Deal; and a big one. The Supreme court in its long awaited decision ruled that the Tennessee Valley Authority act is valid, on all points at issue in the suit brought by the stockholders of the Alabama Power company. Under the ruling the adiministration is free to go ahead with its power program in the Tennessee valley actually under way. The decision was read by Chief Justice Hughes and was concurred in by all the associate justices except Justice McReynolds. He read a dissenting opinion.



Chief Justice Hughes

Because of circumscribed limits the decision was much narrower than most of the New Deal findings of the Supreme court. It was limited strictly to the terms of the contract on which the suit was brought, namely, acquisition by TVA of a transmission line to convey power from the Wilson dam.

Certain phases are still open for possible legal contest in the future, and only Wilson dam, not Norris dam or any other dam constructed or projected on the Tennessee river was involved in the court's finding.

The legal right of the federal government to acquire and own transmission lines to a market for surplus energy—never before directly passed upon by the United States Supreme court—was ruled upon in the affirmative. Unanswered is the question of what constitutes surplus power.

Among the chief points in the majority opinion were these:

The government had full authority to build Wilson dam—keystone of TVA.

Congress has undisputed power to order disposal of electricity developed at the dam.

The government acted legally in building or obtaining through purchase from private companies certain transmission lines to transport power to a wider market.

The government has the same right to dispose of surplus power as it would have to dispose of copper, gold, and minerals on public lands.

Justice McReynolds in answer to this said:

"If under the thin mask of disposing of property the United States can enter the business of generating, transmitting and selling power, as, when and wherever, some board may specify, with the definite design to accomplish ends wholly beyond the sphere marked out for them by the Constitution, an easy way has been found for breaking down the limitations heretofore supposed to guarantee protection against aggression."

BOTH house and senate passed the resolution extending for one year the existing embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and prohibiting loans and credits to belligerents.

Senator Nye was out of the city when the senate assembled, an hour earlier than usual, to act on the measure. Hearing what was going on, he flew from Minneapolis through a storm and arrived five minutes before the final vote but too late to put through any of his proposed amendments. One amendment that was adopted provides that after the President shall have issued his proclamation of the existence of war between or among two or more foreign countries, it shall be unlawful thereafter to sell or purchase in this country bonds or other obligations of any belligerent. The President is authorized to exempt ordinary commercial credits and short time obligations.

SELECTIONS of delegates to the national conventions, already being made in some states, are interesting, especially in the case of New York. Representative Hamilton Fish, supporting Borah for the Republican Presidential nomination, led a hot fight to displace some of the "old guard" and lost, the state committee naming these delegates at large:

Charles D. Hilles and Mrs. Ruth Pratt, members of the national committee; Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, vice chairman of the state committee; Representative Bertrand H. Snell, minority leader of the house; Representative James W. Wadsworth, former United States senator; Edward H. Butler, publisher of the Buffalo Evening News; John R. Crews, Brooklyn leader; Charles H. Griffiths, Westchester county chairman.

Tammany made public the list of its delegates to the Democratic convention, and it is headed by Alfred E. Smith who will represent the tip of Manhattan and Staten island.

President Roosevelt was called on to choose the California Democratic delegation from three sets selected by the conservative Democrats, the Upton Sinclair EPIC followers and the supporters of the Townsend old age pension plan. It was believed he would give the balance of power to the conservatives led by Senator William G. McAdoo, with representation for the other two groups.

UNLESS Governor Hoffman of New Jersey grants him another reprieve, Bruno Richard Hauptmann will be executed during the week of March 30 for the kidnaping and killing of the Lindbergh baby. Sentence on the German carpenter has been again pronounced. For several days Samuel Liebowitz, noted New York criminal lawyer, tried to get Hauptmann to tell another story and reveal his accomplices in the crime, but the condemned man flatly refused and Liebowitz withdrew from the case, saying he believed Bruno to be guilty.

TEN days of hot debate in the senate culminated in the passage of the administration's substitute farm bill by a vote of 56 to 20, and it was hurried over to the house with the prospect of quick approval by that body.

Attacked by Republicans as a subterfuge to get around the Supreme court AAA decision, and frankly conceded by Democrats to be a measure indirectly continuing control of farm production, the soil erosion bill would accomplish its objective as follows:

The secretary of agriculture would be empowered to make benefit payments to farmers who voluntarily cooperate with the government's suggestions on retiring certain land from production to conserve its fertility. Payments would be determined on four factors:

1. Acreage of crop land.
2. Acreage of soil improving crops.
3. Changes in farming practices.
4. Percentage of normal farm production which equals that percentage of normal national production of farm commodities required for domestic consumption.

This arrangement would be limited to two years. It would be replaced by a system of 48 individual state AAA's to regulate production, with the federal government apportioning funds to the states, instead of to farmers. The senate bill provides the state systems may be set up at any time during the next two years.

DELAYED dispatches from the Italian fieldquarters in northern Ethiopia tell of a six-day battle, the fiercest and most important of the war so far, in which the forces of General Badoglio, about 70,000 in number, defeated and routed 80,000 Ethiopians, including 10,000 of the emperor's guard under Ras Mulugheta, war minister, and 70,000 warriors under Ras Kassa and Ras Seyoum. The Italians were left in full possession of the fertile and strategic Enderto region and in control of the passes in the Tembien region.

Gen. Badoglio

After six days of encircling operations, during which torrential rains bogged the field of battle and heavy clouds enabled the Ethiopians to make invisible movements, the March 23 division of blackshirts planted the Italian flag on the mist-veiled high summit of Aradam, completing that particular operation. They then had a clear path to Amba Alagia, 18 miles further south, and it was presumed that the taking of that mountain would mark the cessation of activities because of the coming March rains.

It was estimated that in this battle more than 6,000 Ethiopians had been killed and many times that number wounded. The Italian casualties were not announced but they undoubtedly were not light. Only white Italians participated in the fighting.

CONSIDERABLE interest was aroused in Europe by the publication in a Rome newspaper of a "secret" report made by a British commission appointed in the spring of 1935 "to study British interests in Ethiopia."

The commission reported that it found no outstanding British interests in Ethiopia "of sufficient importance to justify his majesty's government in resisting Italian conquest in Ethiopia." It declared, however, that steps should be taken to safeguard British interests in Lake Tsana, source of the Blue Nile.

ONE of the most spectacular and dynamic figures in American life of today passed with the death of Brig. Gen. William Mitchell in a New York hospital. He succumbed to a heart attack and influenza at the age of fifty-seven years. "Billy," as he was known to airmen, was commander in chief of the American air forces in France during the World war and was decorated by six governments. Afterward, while yet in the regular service, he severely criticized the government's air preparedness policy and was courtmartialed and suspended. Immediately resigning, he devoted himself to lecturing and writing to further his demands for a separate department of aviation in the cabinet, combining both army and navy air defense.

THE War department bill, appropriating approximately 545 million dollars for "national defense," was passed by the house. For purely military purposes the sum of $376,866,333 is allotted. The remainder, $168,359,985, goes for rivers and harbors projects, generally classed as "pork."

An attempt to put back into the bill a $29,000,000 appropriation for carrying on such projects as the Passamaquoddy tidal power experiment in Maine and the Florida ship canal was suppressed firmly. Not until congress has authorized these projects will more funds be provided them, the leaders ruled.

The military budget provided by the bill will be sufficient to maintain an average army of 147,000 men during the coming year. By 1939, according to the War department, the maximum of 165,000 permitted by congress should be reached.

The most important amendment added to the bill was one providing for the employment each year of 1,000 reserve officers on active duty for a 12-month period, of whom 50 will be annually commissioned in the regular army.

SENATOR HUGO L. BLACK of Alabama and his lobby investigation committee are creating a flood of resentment among American citizens that is likely to do vastly more harm than good to the New Deal. Quite without concealment Black is using the committee in a way that thousands of people do not like. He sent out a questionnaire to individuals and organizations known to be opposed to the New Deal, demanding information on their relations with all organizations and their corporation and other investments. Many refused to answer the questions, and they are supported in this position by the American Liberty league, which has challenged the right of Black's committee to compel answer under oath to the queries. In effect, the league dares Black to cite for contempt of the senate those who refuse to reply to the questionnaire.

Senator Black

Senator Black's only reply to date was that it was "a little difficult to believe that the league would attempt to intimidate or coerce its own members to keep their mouths shut until the du Ponts say they can talk."

ACTING on behalf of the senate finance committee, Senator Byrnes consulted the executive department and then introduced an amendment to the independent offices appropriation bill to provide $1,746,000,000 to cash the veterans' bonus. He predicted that it would require no new taxes. The sum mentioned will be sufficient, Byrnes said, together with the 254 million dollars now in the adjusted service certificate fund, to pay in full every outstanding bonus certificate.

In addition to appropriating the cash, the Byrnes amendment would transfer 507 million dollars in bonds to the United States government life insurance fund to repay loans on bonus certificates.

WITH four members voting in the negative, the house ordered an investigation of the money-raising methods of the Townsend old age pension plan advocates. During the debate Dr. Francis E. Townsend was described variously as a "quack," "charlatan," "knave," and "fool." He and his program were defended by the small Townsend bloc.

Attempts by several congressmen to broaden the scope of the inquiry to include such organizations as the Liberty league and the Crusaders were futile.

LEFTISTS won the general election in Spain, and their leader, Manuel Azana, was made premier and formed a new cabinet to supplant that of Valldares. Azana is a veteran statesman, having been the first premier of the present Spanish republic. One of his first acts was the granting of amnesty to thousands of political prisoners who had been in jail since the revolt of October, 1934.

REVOLUTIONARIES, mostly military and led by Colonels Smith and Recalde, veterans of the Chaco war, took possession of the government of Paraguay after some fighting in the streets of Asuncion, the capital. The government forces surrendered to the rebels and President Ayala took refuge on a gunboat. It was announced a new government had been formed with Col. Rafael Franco as its head. He was an exile in Buenos Aires.

WITHOUT especial ceremony the League of Nations moved into its magnificent new home, the white stone palace built for it on the shore of Lake Leman just outside the city of Geneva. The structure is not yet completed for there were delays caused by disputes among the architects of various nations. The large central assembly room will not be ready before September and the library, to which John D. Rockefeller, Jr., donated $2,000,000, cannot be occupied for several weeks.

The palace is really composed of several buildings. One long wing contains the secretariat, another the council hall, a third the library, and a fourth the assembly hall.

Some idea of the immense size of the palace is had by a few figures. There are about 900 offices and other rooms, 1,700 doors, and the same number of windows. There are 21 elevators either for passengers or for goods.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

Washington.—A careful listener could have heard long sighs of relief over the collapse of the senatorial effort to write a more drastic neutrality law. The relief was most pronounced at the White House and State department, but it was evident in many other quarters, notably among senators representing states whose ports and the railroads leading to them thrive on foreign trade. And among Southern congressmen, who feared that in some way or other they would find cotton embargoed if the law were made too drastic.

All of which makes all the activities of Senator Gerald P. Nye so far this session just about a perfect batting average in futility. He tried to smear J. P. Morgan, and the elderly financier emerged with even Nye unable to hate him. He tried to make Woodrow Wilson both putty in the bankers' hands and a liar, and got thoroughly spanked. He tried to force a drastic neutrality law, and the committee on foreign relations, after long consideration, decided merely to extend the present law. Then he attempted an insurgent meeting, even threatening to block extension of the present law in order to force one more drastic, and that is petering out.

There is a great deal of hypocrisy being displayed on this whole neutrality business. Lots of senators and members of the house would like to see the present law die, and nothing whatever put in its place. They know perfectly well, for example, that the present embargo on "arms, ammunition and implements of war" is just diverting business, which would give employment in New England and other arms and ammunition plants, to similar plants in England, Japan, Belgium and Czechoslovakia. Which is especially annoying because the shipments of those countries to Haile Selassie's army are being paid for in gold and silver. So there is no danger of either loss or of becoming involved through extension of credit.

Avoid Quotation

But very few people indeed in political life or out of it are willing to talk that way for quotation. They know they would be denounced by the Nye crowd as being willing to take "blood money," at the best, or as being in the pay of the Du Ponts, at the worst. Meanwhile, of course, the very notion that the chairman of the foreign relations committee, Senator Key Pittman, says is likely to make war on the United States—that is Japan—is building up her munitions industry as a result of America's neutrality law.

But that is something else again. The relief over the collapse of Nye's attempt to make the present embargo more drastic, both for the present war in Africa and for any future war anywhere else—except of course in Latin America—is due more to other interests than to arms and ammunition. It extends to the oil industry, and to copper, to steel and to mules. In fact, conditions might arise which would make almost any given product important in the conduct of a war. Whereupon, to be neutral in the Nye sense of the term, it would be necessary for the United States to bar shipments of that commodity. In the opinion of some others, of course, such an embargo would be anything but a neutral act—depending upon whose ox is gored.

The greatest relief of all, perhaps, was in the office of James A. Farley. Not because of his job as postmaster general, but in his function as chairman of the Democratic National committee, conducting the campaign for the re-election of President Roosevelt.

For there is just no way of measuring the amount of grief that a really tough neutrality bill of the Nye pattern could cause in certain states whose electoral votes are very important.

Still Puzzling

Passamaquoddy and the Florida ship canal are still puzzling everybody but President Roosevelt and Budget Director Bell. Best reports are that Mr. Bell is the only New Dealer now satisfied with the President's action in deciding to give congress a chance to vote on whether more money should be spent on these two projects or not. Certainly Mr. Roosevelt has had plenty of grief since he sent them up to the Capitol.

The first big surprise came, of course, when the house appropriations committee decided to sidetrack the two big projects. The President had thought, of course, to get the projects into the regular congressional pork barrel. Then he would retain all the credit for having started them, and congress would be put in the position of approving them as sound.

There is more to this than just the idea of general congressional approval. For in every pork barrel type of bill members have to vote, naturally, for many things they do not approve.

"You vote for my pork and I'll vote for yours," results in some queer lineups. It results in partisanship being thrown overboard and party lines being obliterated. And when the question comes up in the stump speaking and editorial writing campaign, defenders of the administration would be able to point to all those Republican members who voted for these things their party colleagues were denouncing.

Florida Ship Canal

Representative Green of Florida is leading the fight to restore the Florida ship canal. He has already put the blame for its defeat in the committee on the ship companies, which he says do not want to have their mail carrying fees reduced by having the mileage on trips to gulf ports reduced. The idea of transporting mail from New York to New Orleans by a boat that takes five full days, when regular trains make the journey in two nights, seems a bit odd, but attacks on all corporations seem in fashion.

But the point arises: suppose congress sticks by the action of the house appropriations committee? Suppose the end of the session finds no appropriation for carrying on Quoddy and the Florida canal?

The President then faces disagreeable alternatives. He can accept the repudiation for his two projects, admitting right in the midst of his campaign for re-election, that both simply squandered the taxpayers' money on projects which are not going to be finished—and which his own party in congress did not think worth finishing. Or he can still divert WPA or PWA funds for carrying on the work.

In that case, however, he would lay himself open to violent criticism from another standpoint. It would lend force to the argument that congress had actually turned over all its powers to a dictator—that Roosevelt's action in permitting congress to pass on Quoddy and the Florida canal was much like that of a cat which lets a captured mouse run for a couple of feet before pouncing on it again. It might even irritate a congress already showing considerable signs of independence—though the irritation need not come until congress had adjourned, and need not be feared until next January.

New Farm Bill

The statement of Senator David I. Walsh of Massachusetts that the only benefits claimed from the new farm bill are that it would continue the rain of checks to the farmers, and tend toward cutting the value of the dollar—or inflation—has started comparisons between the present administration's farm plan and, oddly enough, the Hoover foreign loan policy.

Both, it is contended, were "share the wealth" plans as surely as though the late Louisiana Kingfish had designed them. It is the differences that are interesting.

Despite all the clamor about the foreign loans which later went sour, all that the United States, as a whole, lost was goods—farm products and manufactured articles. The trouble is that they were never paid for, in so many instances. But here is the comparison being made:

Who paid or pays the bill? In the AAA farm plan, everybody who eats and wears clothes, thus being obliged to pay processing taxes. Thus money was taken from all the citizens and given to one class, the farmers, on the accepted argument that the farmers were not getting their share in the ordinary processes of wealth distribution. In the new farm plan, taxes will be more widely distributed, but will continue to hit the same people, the burden continuing to fall more heavily on the poor.

Who paid the bill in the bad foreign loan case? The people who had money enough to buy the bonds, plus some who were hit because their banks and insurance companies invested in them. But by far the greater amount came from people with sizable fortunes.

Who got the money? In the farm bills, the farmers. In the bad foreign loan case, more than 90 per cent of it went to the farmers and the workers of this country. The wicked bankers one hears so much about skimmed a nice fat profit, fat because of the amount, but actually very small in percentage. And of course a sizable fraction of that went to the treasury eventually in income taxes. And some of the "profits" went to bond salesmen, an occupation, by way, that once used a lot of white collar workers.

Where It Went

But the great bulk of it went to the men who grew the crops, the men who fabricated the goods for wages, the railroad workers who hauled the goods and crops to seaboard, the miners who dug the coal to provide the power, etc.

It was a very real distribution of wealth, and was the answer to the tremendous boom of that period.

Just as the farm distribution of wealth, which was what the AAA was, and the new so-called conservation plan is intended to be.

There are two important differences. In the farm plans the industrial workers of the country benefit only indirectly—as a result of the increased buying power of the farmers. Whereas in the foreign loan plan both workers and farmers benefited directly. One class of workers, those in transportation, benefited enormously by the foreign loan plan, but have been actually hurt a little by the farm plan due to sharp curtailment of production—hence less freight movement. Incidentally, the stock yards workers suffered even more from the farm plan, though it is promised that there will be nothing so drastic as that again.

The other big difference is in who pays the bills. A much larger proportion of the cost of the farm plan falls on very small income people.

Of course, no one ever called the sour foreign loan system a "plan." It was just a phase of the often decried, in brain trust circles, profit motive.

SYNOPSIS

John Spencer and his cousin, Geoffrey Bohun, are vacationing in Austria. Geoffrey is a gifted portrait painter but prefers to paint landscapes. While strolling in the forest, John hears English voices, and decides to investigate. From safe cover he finds four men burying a man in green livery who, evidently, had been murdered. Pharaoh is the leader of the gang; the others are Dewdrop, Rush and Bugle. Unfortunately, John makes himself known to the assassins by dropping a letter with his name and address. He tells Geoffrey and his chauffeur, Barley, of his adventure. Geoffrey, realizing that John's life is in danger, declares he must vanish. Spencer discovers that the livery of the murdered man corresponds to the livery of the servants of Yorick castle, and tells Countess Helena, mistress of the castle, what he had seen. With Geoffrey and Barley, John starts for Annabel, a nearby village. They encounter Pharaoh. In making their getaway they exchange shots with the gang, without serious result. They arrive at Plumage farm, on the Yorick estate, where Lady Helena had requested John and his cousin to meet her. She reveals to them that her father had converted his immense fortune into gold sovereigns and hidden them away in a secret vault in the castle. Knowing that his son, Valentine, Helena's brother, was incapable of controlling the fortune, he had revealed it to Helena alone just before his death. In some manner the news had leaked out, and Pharaoh is after the treasure. They planned that Geoffrey and Barley would go to Salzburg to watch for Pharaoh, while John was to remain at Plumage, lying low in the daytime and patrolling the roads about Yorick from dusk to dawn.

I started to run down the road with Sabre loping beside me, two inches away from my knee. . . .

The car had stopped now, quite close to the entrance drive.

Cautiously I made my way forward.

I was almost abreast of the tail-light, when Bugle spoke.

"Two 'undred miles a day was what he said. And he took the speedometer reading before he went."

"'E would," said Rush warmly.

"'Cause he ain't no fool," said Bugle. "He's seen your shape before."

"Now look 'ere, Bugle," said Rush. "I'll work the night through, if I'm doin' good. But we ain't goin' to find little Arthur by rakin' these roads."

"Who's rakin' roads?" said Bugle. "Pharaoh says 'Watch that castle,' an' Pharaoh's right. That livery's known. An' once he's found the lady, he'll find her good. 'Where the carcase is,' says Pharaoh," and, with that, he laughed fatly.

"Gimme me the pumps," said Rush. "He's got to take in petrol and 'ow many Rolls d'you see?"

"Pumps," said Bugle contemptuously. "An' when Pharaoh asks if we've got him, what do we say? 'Well, we ain't exactly got him, but 'ere's a list o' the petrol-pumps he's used.'" He let out a bitter laugh. "You know, you'll buy it yet. Maybe you can open a door, but—"

"'E's a nasty mind," said Rush. "That's Gawd's truth, an' you know it. Look at that voice. Off to Salzburg first-class, but no one else must let up. 'E's in some night-club now—you can lay to that. But we've got to work, we 'ave, combin' the country, to pick up the squirt he missed."

"'Ow far 'ave we done" said Bugle.

After an audible struggle with the tale the speedometer told—

"Ninety-four," said Rush.

"Gawd 'elp," said Bugle. 'An' he said two hundred a day."

"Well, we can't do both," said Rush. "If 'e said to watch the castle—"

"Figures is proof," said Bugle. "Anyways young Arthur ain't here," and, with that, he let in his clutch.

I ran for the Rolls like a madman and, panting incoherence to Helena, started the engine and backed the car on to the road. An instant later we were flying in pursuit of Bugle and Rush. After a frantic ten minutes I knew that my quarry was lost, but I went on in desperation for half an hour; then stopped by the side of the road.

"John, they missed you by inches. If they'd met you full in the fairway, you'd have been done. I tell you frankly, I've learned quite a lot tonight. And if they come out tomorrow, I bet we follow them home."

"'We'?" said I. "You're not coming out again."

"I certainly am," said Helena. "For one thing I simply love it, and you're not going to say after this that you can do it alone?"

To my horrid disappointment, we kept a fruitless vigil the next two nights. By now, of course, I had come to know the roads, and the two of us, working together, were continually ready to cope with whatever befell.

So two days and two nights went by, and I had no news for Geoffrey, and, to judge from the wires which he sent, he had none for me.

Our third patrol was over, and my lady and I were riding back from Plumage as the dawn was peering over the eastern woods.

Helena turned to me.

"Will you come and dine this evening? I'm not going to dress."

"I'd love to, Helena."

"Then you ride up by yourself at a quarter to eight and tell Axel to bring up the roan and be at the edge of the forest at half-past nine."

I hesitated. Then—

"I wish," I said, "you'd give it a miss tonight."

"It isn't every day that I fall foul of people like Pharaoh and Pharaoh's crowd. The time's out of joint, my dear John; and if I'm to help reduce it, I've got to step out of my beat. And here we are. Don't look. I'm going to get off."

As she gave me the reins, I had the maddest impulse to throw myself off my horse and take her into my arms.

As I pulled myself together—

"You're trembling, John. Are you cold?"

"No," said I. "I'm dreaming. You know how dogs shake and quiver when they're dreaming some curious dream."

"What are you dreaming?" asked Helena.

"That you and I have ridden up through the forest to the castle to which you belong; that the dawn's coming up, like the frost on a glass of cold water to wake a workaday world; that you're standing there with Sabre, looking at me and smiling."

Her smile deepened into a laugh.

"Am I so unreal?"

"Oh, no. You're wonderfully real. But all the rest is fantastic—the hour, the setting, our having the world to ourselves. And you've done it all, Helena. You've made the magic, created the atmosphere. When you go, it's going to go, too. . . . It's terribly hard to explain," I concluded feebly enough; "but I think you've a power you don't know of, and that's the truth."

"I shall have to be careful," said Helena.

* * * * * * *

It was twelve hours later that I opened a door of the Rolls and regarded the petrol-gauge. This was disconcerting. There was fuel enough for us to do our patrol; but if our quarry appeared there was not enough fuel for pursuit. There was nothing for it. Before we did anything else we must drive to some petrol-pump. For a long time I hesitated, considering whether or no I should not go out forthwith and fetch it alone. But in the end I decided that, though it was most inconvenient, I had not sufficient warrant for breaking my promise not to leave Plumage by day. I, therefore, contented myself with cleaning and oiling the engine. I drove the car on the apron in front of the house, and in this way the car was all ready and when the time came, we should have but to leave our saddles and take our seats.

Then I washed my hands and sat down to write to my cousin; but he never had his letter, for before I had written a page the farmer's wife came smiling to serve my tea.

What that good woman thought of Helena will hardly go into words. All her talk was of the Countess—of her wisdom and understanding, of her lively beauty and charm, and since she had seen her christened, she had memories by the hundred to illustrate everything she said.

Of the Count, however, the woman said nothing at all.

That evening I strolled in the meadows, until it was time to change, and I shall always remember the stillness that hung like a mantle about the meadows and woods. Not that the air was heavy; there was no sign of thunder; the sky was clear. Yet the calm was that which sometimes precedes the tempest—a strange, unnatural condition that was not peace.

* * * * * * *

When I rode into sight of Yorick, I saw that a flag had been hoisted on one of the towers. I could not see the device, for the breeze had fallen to nothing, and the bunting was lying lifeless against the staff. No flag had been flying on Tuesday, when Geoffrey and I had visited Yorick for lunch, but I supposed that today was some festival which it was the custom to honor thoughout the land.

My supposition was wrong.

As I was ushered into the library, Helena rose from a table and took my hand.

"My brother's arrived," she said. "He's only been here twenty minutes, and, as he's brought a friend with him, I've had to put off dinner till half past eight. But that's nothing. What really matters is that he's rather a handful. . . ."

I took my seat beside her on a sofa.

"John," she continued, "I ought to have told you before, but I thought that he'd give me more notice. I'd only time to send the car to the station to meet his train."

Remembering what she had told me of other guests—

"And his friend?" said I.

She shrugged her shoulders.

"Oh, the usual sort, I suppose. I haven't even seen him. Never mind. The point is this. Valentine must know nothing of what is afoot. He doesn't know of the gold, and he must not know. He mustn't know about young Florin, except that he's dead. I've told him I've lent you Plumage—you and your cousin, of course: that your cousin painted our uncle is reason enough. But what makes things difficult is this. He is the Count of Yorick, and, as such, when he's here in the castle he has absolute say. I simply do not count. My father did what he could. He left me 'the contents of the castle' and everything else that he had, except the estate. He hadn't the power to leave that away from his son and heir. And so I've a definite hold on Valentine—which he most deeply resents. But sometimes when he is here the knowledge that he is all-powerful goes to his head.

"I'm bound to tell you all this. He'll probably be quite all right: but if he should show off this evening you'll understand. As I say, I've not seen his friend. If he's no good, I'll soon have him out of the place. But whatever he's like, remember that he is my brother's guest. And Valentine's Count of Yorick. Don't forget that."

"I'll be very careful," I said.

Then we talked of other things and wondered how Geoffrey and Barley were getting on and whether Rush and Bugle would give us our chance tonight. There seemed to be no reason for cancelling the plans we had made.

It was twenty minutes to nine when we heard a burst of laughter, and the library doors were opened by the servant that stood without.

Then the Count came in, still laughing, with his arm about Pharaoh's shoulders and a challenging look in his eyes.

CHAPTER IV

Flight.

How Helena knew that it was Pharaoh, I cannot tell. She knew him the instant she saw his face, for I felt her stiffen beside me before she got to her feet. For Pharaoh himself, I can only say that his address was as perfect as mine was mean.

The Count of Yorick was speaking.

"Helena, this is Captain Faning."

Pharaoh came to her quickly and took her hand. As he looked into her eyes, he spoke very low.

"What a good thing I missed Mr. Spencer. Had I hit him, I should have discarded my ace of trumps."

Before she could answer, he laid his left hand on my arm.

"Mr. Spencer and I," he said, turning, "have met before. In fact, I left his cousin at Salzburg—in excellent health. He was very busy when I saw him. I think he was seeking some subject. . . . I find all his work delightful—he takes such pains."

What immediately followed I cannot clearly remember, because, I suppose, my wits were all over the place.

I know that I stood like some convict, listening to the formality of judgment and finding the grave occasion a hideous dream. I know that Helena introduced me and that I shook hands with the Count—a very good-looking boy, with an overbearing manner and the signs of drink in his face. And I know that while Pharaoh was speaking, he kept a hand under his jacket upon his hip. He might have spared the gesture: my pistol was in the Rolls.

All the time my brain was rampant, darting hither and thither.

In a flash we had been confounded. My cousin and Barley were at Salzburg, but Pharaoh was here in the castle, the guest of the Count. And Dewdrop was here as his servant, and Bugle and Rush were at hand. Though the castle was full of servants, the Countess was powerless as long as her brother was there: besides, my life was forfeit, if Helena lifted a hand. If she sought to disillusion her brother, Pharaoh had only to whisper the secret his sister kept.

That nothing might be wanting to seal our discomfiture—

"My sister tells me you're at Plumage," said the Count. "I hope you've got all you want. I was sent there to shake off measles and I've never liked the place since."

"My Sister Tells Me You're at Plumage," Said the Count.

Before I could answer—

"Where's Plumage?" said Pharaoh, quietly.

The Count told him exactly, whilst I stood dumb.

"Very attractive," said Pharaoh, and tossed his cocktail off. "May I speak to my servant a minute?"

The fellow's audacity shook me. For some reason I did not fear him, but his monstrous impertinence hit me over the heart.

His intention was clear. While we dined, Dewdrop would seek Rush and Bugle, and the two would be waiting at Plumage when I returned.

And Helena and I could do nothing.

I heard the Count send for "Captain Faning's servant." Before he arrived, however, the doors were opened again and a butler entered the room.

"My lady is served."

As we passed through the hall, the curtains of an archway were parted and Dewdrop appeared. Helena saw him, as I did, and quickened her pace.

My lady and I were within the dining room. Except for the servants we had the room to ourselves.

I heard her speak to the butler.

"Ask the Count to begin," she said. Then she turned to me. "Come," she breathed.

In a flash she was out on the ramparts, with me behind. There she turned to the left and ran like the wind.

What a Troubled World?
What Will TVA Do?
Schwab Still Smiles
Steam Turbine Planes

Will this troubled world ever calm down, supply work to those willing to work and live happily, and enable superior ability to show what it can do?

Arthur Brisbane

Spain, waking from long lethargy, is swept by riots, jails stormed and set afire. Rioting and rebellion in South America; will our friendly feeling compel us to attempt straightening that out? Rioting in Paris and sabotage on English men-o'-war.

Nations fight, classes fight, labor unions fight, and even men of the same religion fight.

Washington wonders what TVA will do with the Supreme court letting government enter the business of producing and selling power.

Some suggest putting power on every farm, regardless of distance or cost, as rural mail delivery is put on every farm.

If every home is entitled to government mail delivery, every farm should be entitled to government power delivery on the same basis. That would mean business for copper companies, more running water in cow barns, more irrigated garden patches, more electric light after sundown in chicken coops.

Charles M. Schwab, seventy-four, still specializes in optimism, like the man who went to the race track, lost every cent, but escaped death in the railroad wreck. Mr. Schwab says labor conditions are the best in 56 years. He should know; he began as a laborer and did not get $5, or $3, or $2 a day. Industry he calls a "three-legged stool." Capital, labor, management are the three legs.

Put Charles M. Schwab back where he was 56 years ago, the same as then, in age and energy, and he would soon be at the head of a great industry. Who does not believe it does not know Schwab.

Russia, trying everything, experiments with a steam-propelled turbine plane for stratosphere flights. At such heights water boils at half the temperature necessary at sea level. The exhaust steam after heating the plane would be recovered 90 per cent. Two years ago William and George Bessler, in Los Angeles, built and flew a plane with a steam engine. There is still much to learn about flying.

Uncle Sam, convinced that he is his brother's keeper, after all, wants a peace agreement among all American republics.

Beautiful. But if any republic decides to fight, anyhow, it is to be hoped this country will not become arbitrator.

"Judge not that ye be not judged," is sound advice.

We can no more decide the right and wrong of a row between Mussolini and England, or Chile and the Argentine, than we could between the two Kilkenny cats.

It is pleasing to learn from George Washington university of a new and "refreshing" preparation that makes possible childbirth, "during sound sleep," without pain.

More and better children, bigger population, is what the world needs, with gradual elimination of the hopelessly inferior race by absorption, or voluntary extermination.

Poor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia, waiting for the rainy season to expel the Italians, suddenly found his army of 80,000 driven hither and thither, and two other armies, under two of his ablest "rases," sent scattering into the jungle.

Seventy thousand Italians seizing a mountain fort that Ethiopia thought impregnable started the Mussolini kind of "rainy season" with bombs from the sky. This time Mussolini used his own white, Italian soldiers, not his native troops from Eritrea.

Russia and Japan seem to be approaching war. Recently Russia closed its consulate general at Mukden, in Japanese Manchukuo: no reason given. Japanese and Manchukuoan air forces are reported prepared for instant action. Japan protests against Russia's huge army in Siberia. Something may happen.

Chancellor Hitler announces: "We have solved the problem of producing synthetic gasoline and rubber."

How good are the synthetic fuel and rubber; how cheap? These things will come, for science in the material world can do everything better than nature can do it.

Fuel will be created, and flying machines, too, as far above today's products as electric light is above whale oil, and the airplane above the ox-cart.

New Jersey high schools will give courses in "safe automobile driving," a good idea. All school boys should learn about automobiles and airplanes.

Leaning Tower of Pisa Only a Second-Rater in Slanting

The Leaning Tower of Pisa is not unique. Similar structures exist all over the world, and some are even higher and more out of perpendicular than that of Pisa. They are campaniles, steeples, pagodas, minarets and lighthouses such as the Portoferraio on Elba.

Do You Ever Wonder

Whether the "Pain" Remedy You Use is SAFE?

Ask Your Doctor and Find Out

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well - Being to Unknown Preparations

THE person to ask whether the preparation you or your family are taking for the relief of headaches is SAFE to use regularly is your family doctor. Ask him particularly about Genuine BAYER ASPIRIN.

He will tell you that before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin most "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as bad for the stomach and, often, for the heart. Which is food for thought if you seek quick, safe relief.

Scientists rate Bayer Aspirin among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and the pains of rheumatism, neuritis and neuralgia. And the experience of millions of users has proved it safe for the average person to use regularly. In your own interest remember this.

You can get Genuine Bayer Aspirin at any drug store — simply by asking for it by its full name, BAYER ASPIRIN. Make it a point to do this — and see that you get what you want.

I'M SOLD

It always works

Just do what hospitals do, and the doctors insist on. Use a good liquid laxative, and aid Nature to restore clocklike regularity without strain or ill effect.

A liquid can always be taken in gradually reduced doses. Reduced dosage is the real secret of relief from constipation.

Ask a doctor about this. Ask your druggist how very popular Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin has become. It gives the right kind of help, and right amount of help. Taking a little less each time, gives the bowels a chance to act of their own accord, until they are moving regularly and thoroughly without any help at all.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin contains senna and cascara—both natural laxatives that form no habit. The action is gentle, but sure. It will relieve any sluggishness or bilious condition due to constipation without upset.

Right: Fight

If one has rights, one has always to be in a fight with some one.

Black-Draught Relief Prompt and Refreshing

It's a good idea that so many people have—to keep Black-Draught handy so they can take a dose for prompt relief at the first sign of constipation.

Mr. Sherman Sneed, of Evensville, Tenn, writes: "I take Black-Draught for constipation which causes headache, a bad, tired feeling and for biliousness, bad taste in the mouth and sluggish feeling. Black-Draught, taken about two nights, clears up this trouble and I get all right."

Men and women like Black-Draught so well because of the refreshing relief it brings in constipation troubles.

THOUGHT FOR THE DAY

"And when the One great Scorer comes
To write against your name
He writes not that you WON or LOST,
But HOW you played the game."

The above lines have long formed the basis of one of my favorite quotations, and days become only dull and gray when we FAIL to play the game fairly and squarely with our friends and co-workers. After all, a FAIR and SQUARE deal is about all anyone of us wants or expects—but how very few there are who pause long enough during the hectic rush, to give a bit of thought to HOW they are "playing the game." The dividend from such an inventory might be a profitable one for those who have employed their seemingly inexhaustible supply of idle moments, and are still busily engaged in cordially cutting throats, discarding TRUTH because it is not exciting enough for those who depend on the characters and lives of their neighbors for amusement. The mingling of truth with falsehood is a tapestry not very beautiful to look upon. Startling disclosures are made occasionly. It is really time for a NEW DEAL—and the role of DUMMY would be a welcome one—at least long enough to allow a breathing spell. Too much chatter is always a personal confession either of malice or imbecility. Better STOP—and give a little thought to HOW you are playing the game! Such contemplation might change the Final Score!

MR. AND MRS. O. R. HEAD

We had the happy privilege of welcoming in our home on Sunday afternoon, two of our favorite friends—Mr. and Mrs. O. R. Head—former residents of Columbiana, who now reside in picturesque Cheahau where Mr. Head, Director of the CCC forces is receiving State and national recognition for his development of this section of Alabama, Mrs. Head (Julia Kimbrough) will be happily remembered by legions of friends throughout Shelby County as she was for several years, the capable Director of Child Welfare for Shelby County. Right here and now in black and white do we accept the cordial invitation for a visit with them in the Spring "when the VIOLETS and WILD ROSES bloom"—and we also tender our thanks for their continued interest and loyalty in our errant pen point industry—and—melodies, which, in some miraculous way, still linger on!

PATRICIA CAMP

Holding the spotlight of attraction on Sunday afternoon was Little Patricia Camp, six months old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ehney A. Camp of Birmingham. "Patsy" was on the receiving line in the home of her grand-parents, Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Christian, and a more charming little person would be hard to find. She combines the attractive and gracious personality of her pretty little mater with the poise and dignity of her friendly Dad—and what more could you ask? Attired in a new Spring version of blue embroidered batiste—with a perky blue bow tied at just the right coquetish angle, the "Beautiful Lady In Blue" captured all hearts and when we stayed a bit over-time, she gave a suggestion of an artistic temperament which "those who knew her best" insisted meant ORANGE JUICE PRONTO! We personally state to you from the top of her head to the tip of her dainty white kid sandals, she was ADORABLE! Everything we had heard about this famous little baby-kin was true plus 100 per cent!

Advertising is salesmanship on paper. If you want to make an advertising hit, all you need do is talk to merchants who have used the columns of the Democrat to put their goods "over the top." The Shelby County Democrat is the merchants best medium of advertising. One progressive firm in Shelby County writes us that an ad in the Democrat is as good as a personal talk with their customers.

Heart Drifts

PRAYER

O let me give my love with open hands,
Ask nothing in return, nor make demands
That might prove wearisome to him; nor press
Too close seeking response or tenderness.
Help me to walk apart and leave him free
To go untrammelled, or to come to me
When he has need—to lay no care of mine
Upon his heart. And may I not repine
If he withholds from me aught I would give
Thus leaving love wide space, where it may live.
So let it be, O Lord, until life's end,
That rarest of all things, a PERFECT FRIEND.

WITHOUT YOU

Did you hear the wind song
In the storm that swept the glade?
Did you hear the footsteps
Of the raindrop calvacade?

Did you see the Twilight
Clasp the trembling hands of day—
Hide her from the darkness
In soft, flowing robes of gray?

Did you see the Lightening
Pierce the torn heart of the sky?
Did you hear me calling
Calling, as you passed me by?

But, ah, my fireside heart
Is bent on staying here!

CERTAINTIES

Whether you live by hut or throne,
Whether your feet tread stone or grass,
Comes the one lad you shall never own,
Or the one lass.

Whether you've pence to spend or gold,
Whether you've toiled, or time to weep,
Comes the one pain that may never be told,
And may never sleep.

Whether you weep or mock in pride,
Whether you tell or still deny,
Comes the one scar that your heart shall hide,
Till the day you die.

SEGREGATED SELVES

I hate a segregated self
With everything done neatly,
With attributes upon each shelf
Sequested there completely.

They want to keep my moods apart-
The flippant, proud and humble
But gad! The doings of my heart
Are one continued jumble!

So let me scribble as I feel
One minute sad and serious,
And then a tiny turn of heel—
And I am mad, delirious.

With all the dizzy joy of things—
Then turn perhaps to sorrow
Do let my spirit flap its wings!
It may have none tomorrow.

POULTRY

QUALITY CHICKS MAKE PRODUCERS

Fixed Characteristics Are Important.

By Roy S. Dearstyne, Poultry Department, North Carolina State College. WNU Service.

No poultryman can develop a flock of good layers from a brood of inferior chicks. Good chicks make good birds.

Some poultrymen can breed and raise their own chicks with satisfactory results, but most flock owners will find it better to purchase chicks from a reliable hatchery.

The best chicks come from disease-free parents, are true to breed, and develop into superior layers. A carefully bred chick receives from its parents certain characteristics which carry with them the success or failure of the poultryman.

Among the most vital factors transmitted from parent to chick are:

The ability to produce. A hen laying 175 eggs a year costs no more to keep than a bird producing only 100 eggs.

Egg size.—The size of the eggs laid by a bird is a characteristic coming directly from its parents. Large eggs bring better prices than small ones.

Early feathering.—This bears a direct relation to broiler prices, as every poultryman attempting to market poorly feathered birds has discovered.

Early sexual maturity.—Frequently the well bred Reds or Rocks will come into production 60 days sooner than inferior birds, thus giving 60 days' extra production.

Give these things serious consideration when breeding or purchasing chicks for the coming year.

Must Keep Feeding Cost Down to Make Flock Pay

Feed costs are likely to contain serious leaks. Feed is the largest item of expense on the poultry farm and it is important for the poultryman to keep this cost down without going below the minimum requirements for good feeding, asserts F. H. Branch, extension economist of Massachusetts State college.

Branch lists several don'ts concerning feed practices. "Don't hold growing birds which are to be marketed after they cease to make rapid gains in weight. Don't keep hens that have stopped laying for any length of time unless they show prospects of staging a come-back. Don't use feed hoppers that permit hens to pull grain out and waste it. Don't buy high priced rations if a cheaper home mixed ration has given you just as good results. Don't buy feed in small quantities if you can get reduced prices on quantity lots.

No well-managed poultry business is complete without a yearly inventory, a simple record of receipts and expenses, an egg production record, and an account of the number of birds removed by death or culling, says Mr. Branch. Such a record supplies the information for spotting leaks in the business.

Instinct Rules in Egg

According to a great naturalist writer, among birds instinct inhibits all sounds whenever any noise is heard. With certain species this suppression may be noticed even before the young are hatched. "When the little prisoner is hammering at its shell," he says, "and uttering its first feeble 'peep,' as if begging to be let out, if the warning note is uttered, even at a considerable distance, the strokes and complaining instantly ceases, and the chick will then remain quiescent in the shell for a long time."

English Boys Raise Poultry

Junior Poultry club work is carried on in Great Britain under the name of the Young Farmers' club movement. Northumberland was one of the first counties in England to develop Young Farmers' clubs. In the Junior Poultry club there are 100 members, and 200 in the Shorthorn Calves club, whilst a further 150 people are associate members, taking a keen interest in all club work.

Turkey House Needed

If the mature turkeys are given their choice they will remain out of doors most all winter except in time of storms. Their winter quarters or shelter should be a place where no other poultry has been kept. When a building is used, windows should be covered with slats or wire fencing on the south. Other openings on the south should equal one square foot for each ten square feet of floor space. This additional opening should be covered with wire netting and burlap.

Selecting the Breeders

For those who "hatch their own" and particularly if they hatch early chicks, it is not too early to begin selecting the breeders for next year's layers. Too much care cannot be exercised in this task, for careful selections of the individuals to be used in the breeding pen is a most important step in raising the standard of production whether the final object in view be more eggs, improved plumage color and body type, or a better meat quality.

A man in search of a quiet holiday set out in a small sailing boat, his only equipment consisting of provisions and a wireless set. He sailed serenely for several days, until at last he sighted one of those liners which resemble small towns rather than ships, says the London Observer. The appearance of the little boat created excitement on board the liner, which slowed down.

The captain was wondering whether it was a matter of going to the rescue when the holiday maker moved to his transmitter and tapped out the message: "Is there anything I can do for you?"

End of World Idea Stale; Planet Collision Unlikely

We are never deeply alarmed over the annual, sometimes semi-annual, predictions that the world is soon coming to an end (it is a wornout way of attracting attention to oneself, too). The only manner in which the world can reach annihilation is by some great convulsion among the planets. The mathematical system of the universe must have been worked out long ago, or we should see in our day at least one or two collisions of worlds whirling through space. But they do not collide; and they have not collided since the morning stars sang together.

They are a perfect example of perpetual motion, and, therefore, the deathless inspiration of those earthly souls who think that if perpetual motion can and does prevail in the scheme of cosmos, they can discover the secret. Persons who predict the end of the world are unscientific individuals with indifferent reasoning powers.—F. H. Collier in St. Louis Globe Democrat.

Chic Suit, Gay Print Share Honors

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

LET'S go crystal-gazing in search of fashion futures for spring. What do we see? According to the signs of the times it's suits, suits and suits plus, coming in endless procession on the new style program. Indeed, 'tis prophesied that this will be the biggest suit season ever.

Of course a suit means just one lovely, stunning blouse after another, and as to accessories, well, you'll be surprised at the smartness, the cleverness and the color-chic of the bags, and the belts, the scarfs, the gloves and the footwear and gadgets that novel they invite a smile, all of which will play a part in dramatizing the suit theme for spring.

After you get an "eye-full" of suits as revealed in the crystal globe of fashion, turn the other eye. Behold! The picture shifts to a scene of riotous color and startlingly new design for the incoming prints are just that. Birds, fruits, vegetables, postage stamps and newspaper print, are some of the many unique motifs that gay print fabrics are staging this season.

The lesson to be gleaned in this foreglance into fashion's moves is that in assembling the new spring wardrobe one must think in terms of both cloth suit and costume of gay print. One is almost as important as the other in the scheme of fashionable apparel. So count on a budget that makes provision for both.

As to the new suits, their most outstanding message is "mannish" both as to the stunning woolens which fashion them as well as their manner of tailoring. The more "man's-wear" look your suit carries the smarter will it be. The favorite among favorites bids fair to be the strictly tailored short-jacket type buttoned single row or double breasted.

As to color for the new tailored mannish woolens, fancy runs decidedly to grays in every degree from light to dark and to mixtures that give a gray impression. Spice brown is also good style and it is interesting to note the many blues showing. The up-to-the-moment suit pictured is of chalky French-blue imported woolen. Buttons in double row accent the front panel which is cut in one with the yoke of the brief jacket. The hat, gloves and bag are navy, so are the shoes, for navy footwear, you know, is going to be pronouncedly in fashion this spring.

And now to prints! It will be difficult to choose from the wealth of print fabrics being shown. Jacket frocks made of striking prints claim most of the attention because they are so eminently practical. The dress itself can be worn attractively under the long topcoat, reserving the print jacket for later on.

The refreshing new styling given to the advance spring jacket frocks simply fascinates with display of originality that identifies spring 1936 vintage at a glance, as for example the good-looking print costume pictured. The material of which it is made is an all-bemberg triple sheer in leaf green, brown and beige checks. The jacket with full graceful sleeves alternates bands of net with bands of the triple sheer print. Jeweled buttons lend a brilliant touch.

You will be wanting a number of these smart-looking and practical triple sheers in your spring wardrobe. These fabrics are not weighted and consequently launder or dry clean beautifully.

NEW HAT FASHION

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

To say that the new "Rose of the Rancho" hat is making an instantaneous hit is but expressing it mildly. See in the illustration herewith Gladys Swarthout, lovely singer and one of filmland's bright and shining stars, wearing this hat just as she wears it in her picture and now many stores and shops are showing it in their advance millinery displays. It is the type young girls will delight in wearing with their sports outfits. The chin-strap detail of cord cleverly drawn through a big button is irresistible. Of course to complete the ensemble one must have a high-color dude-ranch handkerchief-square scarf knotted nonchalantly about the throat.

Jeweled Pins

The highly prized diamond-back terrapins of Maryland and points south have nothing on their swanky little counterpart in catalin and simulated gold. The turtle pin not only has head and legs of gold but also a colorful shell studded with tiny rhinestones. In practically any color this jeweled creature outshines by far the pride of Baltimore.

GREEK INSPIRATION HITS SHOE STYLES

The Greek inspiration which has so noticeably influenced the evening mode for dresses is also affecting shoe styles. There is a very strong tendency to adopt sandals or low-heeled shoes for full evening dress. These sandals are extremely chic for those who know how to wear them, and are seen in the same fabric as the dress—in velvet, in lame and in brocade, sometimes combined with supple gold or silver kid.

Very rich models entirely covered with sequins, with embroidery or with beads of plastic materials, are displayed by leading designers. To accompany Worth evening dresses, Julienne has designed some new sandals with almost flat heels, which are square instead of being round.

Originality Characterizes New Paris Winter Tailleurs

Great originality characterizes the new winter tailleurs, for morning or afternoon purposes. In the line of sport tailleurs, a jacket is almost invariably in a fabric that contrasts with the skirt. Schiaparelli shows a skirt in plain material while the jacket is in tartan or in fancy woolen. She carries the same idea for the afternoon with a plain skirt in dull rayon crepe and the jacket in a fancy mixture showing slit cellulose film.

Wraps Are Glamorous

For some seasons now, many women have been making a fur coat do when they did don full evening dress. But this season wraps are so glamorous, so handsome, so theatrical, that even she who only goes out once or twice a season can't resist them. A lovely affair is a full-skirted wrap of pale beige velvet with shirring and cordell detail. It has a big mink collar. Another wrap is of quilted white silk in a heavy weave.

IMPROVED UNIFORM INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL Lesson

Lesson for March 1

VISION AND SERVICE

LESSON TEXT—Luke 9:28-43a.

GOLDEN TEXT—He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same beareth much fruit.—John 15:5b.

PRIMARY TOPIC—On a Mountain Top With Jesus.

JUNIOR TOPIC—On a Mountain Top With Jesus.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—With Jesus in Prayer and Service.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Worship and Work.

The subject of this lesson as chosen by the lesson committee needs to be most rigidly held to its place as set forth in the Scriptures. The lesson should not be taught in a general way as pertaining to vision and service. The particular vision herein set forth is the unveiling of the majestic person of the Son of God, with an epitome of the messianic kingdom.

Jesus took with him Peter, James, and John, and went into the mount to pray. His chief aim in retirement was to get the disciples into a state of receptivitiy so that he might show them the reality and method of his kingdom. Before going into the mount, he declared that there were some standing in his presence who would not taste death until they should see the Son of man coming in his kingdom (Luke 9:27; cf. Matt. 16:28). That their drooping spirits might be revived and their confidence restored, he was transfigured before them. Two men from the upper world were sent to converse with him about his approaching death in Jerusalem (v. 31)—the very thing about which the disciples refused to talk. Then, too, God's own voice was heard in words of approval of Christ's course, directing them to hear the Master. Surely now they cannot doubt his ability to carry to execution his kingdom plans. The purpose, then, of the transfiguration was to give the disciples a foregleam of the coming kingdom, to enable them to see the kingdom in its embryonic form. That this is true is not only shown by the context and circumstances, but by the inspired interpretation of one who was with him and knew all that transpired (see II Pet. 1:16-19, R. V.). Let us, therefore, note the outstanding features of the kingdom as displayed in the transfiguration.

I. Jesus Christ the Glorified King on Mount Zion (vv. 28, 29).

Jesus glorified on the mount to which they went to pray was intended to symbolize the messianic kingdom as it will be when Christ returns literally to the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem (Zech. 14:4-17).

II. The Glorified Saints With Christ (vv. 30, 31).

1. Moses, who was once denied entrance into Palestine, appears now in glory, representing the Redeemed of the Lord who after death shall pass into the kingdom. Many thousands of the redeemed have fallen asleep, and at the coming of the Lord shall be awakened to appear in the kingdom with him.

2. Elijah, now glorified, represents the redeemed who shall pass into the kingdom through translation. Many shall be living upon the earth when the Lord comes, and shall, without dying, be changed, and thus pass into the kingdom (1 Cor. 15:50-53; I Thess. 4:14-18).

3. The topic of conversation (v. 31). It was the death of Christ, the very thing the disciples refused to believe.

III. Israel in the Flesh in Connection With the Kingdom, Represented by Peter, James, and John (v. 28).

Israel shall be called from their hiding place among the nations of the earth and shall be gathered to Jesus Christ, the King, as the central people in the kingdom (Ezek. 37:21-27). Christ is the King of the Jews.

1. Peter's proposal to build three tabernacles (v. 33). The Feast of the Tabernacles looked forward to the glorious reign of Christ. Peter caught a glimpse of the significance of the transfiguration. His proposition showed that he apprehended the meaning of the Feast of the Tabernacles and, therefore, his proposition substantially was, "The millennium is come; let us celebrate."

2. The divine voice (v. 35). At this time God himself uttered words which assured them that the transfigured one was his Son, Jesus Christ.

IV. The Multitude at the Foot of the Mount (vv. 37-43).

The people here were grievously oppressed by the devil, as illustrated by the demon-possessed lad. There are times when the devil is especially active in the affairs of men. The multitude at the foot of the mount is representative of the nations which shall be brought into the kingdom which shall be established over Israel (Isa. 11:10-12).

Toys Are the Realities of World in Which Child Lives

Toys are to the child what work and tools and recreation are to adults. To a large degree, appropriate toys for the various age levels depend on the individual child; the toy should be just a little more advanced than the child's present stage of development, says Billie Teel Mettel in Hygeia.

The preschool child should be given playthings of an order not so plentiful in school, that will give him contact with nature, instruct him in simple handwork and exercise the large fundamental muscles. Imitative play becomes important at this time, and the laundry set, drawing paper and wooden garden tools are welcome and appropriate toy gifts.

Arteriosclerosis Old Stuff; Bothered Ancient Egyptians

The foe of life expectancy is no longer without, but within, and the problem of conquest is an entirely different one from that presented by the infectious diseases. The problem now is that of arterial degeneration, which is called arteriosclerosis. This is not a new condition, Dr. R. W. Scott says in Hygeia in "Forty Years Old—or Forty Years Young?" for arteriosclerosis is found in Egyptian mummies of the first dynasties and one may assume that it also took its toll of prehistoric adults.

Serious trouble may be brewing and you cannot afford to take a chance with anything less than Creomulsion, which goes right to the seat of the trouble to aid nature to soothe and heal the inflamed membranes as the germ-laden phlegm is loosened and expelled.

FARMERS everywhere are enthusiastic in their praises of the Firestone Ground Grip Tire — they say it's the greatest traction tire ever built, and so economical. How was it possible for Firestone to build such a remarkable tire? Firestone patented construction features are the answer. Gum-Dipping, a process that soaks every cotton fiber in every cord with pure liquid rubber, prevents internal friction and heat and gives the cord body greater strength to withstand the stresses and strains of heavy pulling at low air pressures.

The patented feature of two extra layers of Gum-Dipped cords under the tread locks the massive super traction tread securely to the body of the tire. This patented Ground Grip tread is made wider, heavier and deeper, with scientific spacing between the bars so that the tire is self-cleaning, yet rides smoothly on improved roads. These patented construction features are used only in Firestone Tires. This is why you get greatest traction, longest life and outstanding performance in Ground Grip Tires. They are the best investment a farmer can make.

Equip your car, truck, tractor and farm implements with new Firestone Ground Grip Tires and save yourself time, money and hard work. See this remarkable tire at your nearby Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store, at your Tire Dealer, or at your Implement Dealer. Remember, when buying farm equipment specify Firestone Ground Grip Tires for greatest efficiency and economy.

WHY GO TO CHURCH

By Henry M. Hurst

1. To keep our appointments in religion as we do in business.
2. To give our souls, smothered by many interests, a chance to breathe.
3. To set a time-honored example for our friends who trust us.
4. To worship God. (In prayer to declare His "Worthship.")
5. To praise Him from whom all blessings flow.
6. To meet "all sorts and conditions" on the plane of brotherhood.
7. To give a glad lift to those whose arms are straining under the load.
8. To quiet in us the voice which says, "You ought."
9. To save the Lord's Day, the Bible, and hence, America.
10. To accept an invitation rather than obey a command.

THE DOORS OF BOTH CHURCHES IN COLUMBIANA ARE WIDE OPEN, AND, FOR YOUR OWN SAKE, URGE YOUR FAITHFUL ATTENDANCE.

FROM THE GREENVILLE ADVOCATE, FEBRUARY 14, 1936

"The retirement of the veteran Congressman Oliver indicates that Pete Jarman will go to Washington. Mr. Jarman ran a close second to Mr. Oliver two years ago. Anyone that could give "Buck" Oliver any kind of opposition has to be considered as a dangerous opponent. We are no tmeddling in politics outside of our own baliwick, but we'll put our money on Pete Jarman to represen tthe sixth district.

When a man begins to realize the truth about himself, it frequently retards his program for reforming his neighbors.

Playing the opening game of the Fifth District Tournament, Tuscaloosa County High School from Northport, won from the Shelby County High School quintet last Thursday at the new Bessemer gym by the score of 21 to 17.

The game was considered one of the best ever seen on the Bessemer floor.

Defensive play of the Shelby High team, starring Crowe, midget guard, was the highlight of the game. Bishop, captain and forward of the Tuscaloosa crew, was outstanding offensive. Until Crowe was ousted from the game by committing fouls in the third quarter, the Tuscaloosa team was held at bay.

Wallace, Columbiana's lanky center led the scoring with six points. The Tuscaloosa center, Andrews, was next with five points to his credit. The scoring was very evenly distributed and there were no individual high scores made.

NOTES OF HOME DEMONSTRATION

Up until this time there have been 273 women enrolled in the fourteen Home Demonstration Clubs in the County. Nine 4-H Clubs have been organized with an enrollment of 303.

It is most essential that your family get some kind of fresh vegetable and raw fruit at this season of the year. These may be cabbage, (preferably raw) carrots, turnips, greens etc.

An inexpensive salad combination may be made from the following:

1-4 Head of Cabbage
1 Apple
3 Grated Carrots
Cup chopped celery, or dash of celery seed
Nuts and raisins may be added if on hand.

SALAD DRESSING

1 Egg Yolk
1 Tablespoon Sugar
1 Tablespoon Vinegar
1-4 Cup Whipped Cream

DIRECTIONS: Put egg yolk, sugar and vinegar in top of double boiler. (Do not lalow the water to boil in the bottom of the pan.) Remove from boiler and cool. When ready to serve add whipped cream. This dressing is delicious for other fruit salads.

Mrs. Z. S. Cowart and Mrs. Jasper Holcombe were in Birmingham Wednesday for the day.

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

You fellows will probably wonder why I keep blabbing so much about this Lone Scout business. O. K. then I'll tell you. The big reason is because I am interested a great deal in this department of Scouts. Still another is the fact that National Headquarters has sent out a plea to Scoutmasters and leaders to help them in developing this particular program.

According to figures from Headquarter thirty-four per cent of all boys of Scout age live in the country and a very large number of these boys, because of isolation and other conditions, cannot have the troop and Scoutmaster's relationship, and if we are to give them a Scouting service it will have to be done on a Lone Scout basis.

National Headquarters, therefore challenge your interest, as Scouts and Scoutmasters to help the national office to meet this need in our rural areas. Invite all boys who cannot join the troops, to become Lone Scouts and send their names and addresses to your Scout executive, or to the National Council, office, 2 Park Aevnue, New York City.

It would be a fine thing for a Scout master and troop to sponsor the Lone Scout work in the outlying districts of troop territory and offer all Lone Scouts an associate relationship to the troop. Each member of the troop, through correspondnece, could accept the responsibility for the leadership of one Lone Scout, and act as a brother Scout.

Lone Scouts take the same oath, obey the same laws, wear the same uniform and practic ethe principles of "Be Prepared" and "Do A Good Turn Daily."

When five or more Lone Scouts live in the same area, the forming of a Lone Scout Tribe is advised; later this Tribe may very naturally develop into a regular troop with the leadership of a Scoutmaster an dthe reinforcement of a troop committee. In a recent report from 1,500 Scoutmasters who have troops in rural communities, we find the following interesting data: 75% of these troops are in farm communities and most of the troop membership live on farms. 76% of the Scoutmasters repora a special need of a more definite rural program: 250 troop scouts are also Lone Scouts and 1,375 Scouts are members of 4-H Clubs.

The Merit Badge program of 90 subjects is also available to Lone Socuts; about 40 of these subjects are especially suitable for Lone Scouts or boys who live in the open country.

The National Lone Scout Commission has recommended the following twelve priniciples for the administration of the Lone Scout program. These twelve points have been approved by the Lone Scout Advisory Committee and adopted by the National Boy Scout Executive Board.

1. A Lone Scout is primarily a rural boy who cannot be a member of a Boy Scout troop.
2. A Scout who belongs to a troop is a "Troop Scout"; one who does not belong to a troop is a "Lone Scout."
3. Provisions may be made for registering as Lone Scouts boys who for good reasons either within or without their own control cannot be registered is a troop.
4. A Lone Scout may be registered in the territory served by a troop.
   (a) Under Council—with the approval of the local council.
   (b) Not under Council—with the approval of the National Council.
5. All Lone Scout activities in local council territory shall come under the jurisdiction of the local territory only where and when the local council is in a position to do the work properly.
6. The National Council shall handle directly all Lone Scouting not under council and, until taken over by the local council, all Lone Scouts activities in council territory following the same adminstrative practice as heretofore applied to pioneer Boy Scouts.
7. The registration fee shall be the same for both troop and lone Scouts. The method of collecting may be different.
8. The same plan for annual registration shall apply to both troop and lone Scouts with provisions for annual advance notice and "follow up" for Lone Scouts in principle as heretofore applied to pioneer Scouts.
9. The present self-government plan of the Lone Scout shall be continued so far as practical.
10. That a Boy Scout Amateur Press Association be established.
11. That boys under 12 years of age be provided for through a separate but specially prepared program to meet the nedds of rural Scouts.
12. That the Lone Scout Commission be continued and that it submit additional recommendations for "rural" Scouting both for lone and troop Scouts at an early date.

CRIPPLED CHILDREN GETS TREATMENTS

The are approximately 8 000 crippled children in the State of Alabama Two thousand of these have received treatment under Alabama's program for crippled chidlren thru the Crippled Children's Service of the State Department of Education.

One-third of the crippled children can be completely restored, another one-third can be sufficiently restored to earn their own living and compete in industry with the norma, and less than one-third of the crippled of necessity become an economic liability to anyone.

The possibilities of the third item depend almost altogether on a state program to find, hospitalize and cure these children, since the average parent does not know that his crippled child can be cured of his disability.

There are twenty (20) clinic centers in Alabama, so that no child in the state is more than fifty miles from a clinic center, if the state program can function.

A clinic for crippled children is being held in every clinic center in Alabama this year.

Every crippled child is urged to be brought to the clinic center on the clinic day when all crippled children in that clinic district are given free diagnosis and recommendations are made for treatment.

INFLUENZA VICTIMS MUST BE CAUTIOUS

MONTGOMERY—While the recent outbreak of influenza has been serious enough in some localities to cause authorities to close the schools for a few days as a precautionary measure, there is little likelihood that there will be an epidenmic as serious as those which have swept the State in previous years.

In most instances, the influenza apparently is of a mild type, confining victims to bed for only a few days. However, this statement is not to be taken to indicate that we hsould not take every precaution against it. A person who contracts the disease or feels like he might be contracting it, should go to bed and stay at home until released by his physician and until his temperature has been normal for twenty-four hours. To go out too soon after being able to get up may result in a relapse with more serious consequences. This, too, would endanger the health of others. Reports coming into the centra office indicate that the disease is definitely on the wane.

It is said that seven out of every ten pounds of butter substitutes produced are eaten by the farmers of the country. This reminds us of the restaurant keeper who always went to the lunch room across the street to get his own meals.

Japanese Rebels Slay Four Statesmen and Dictatorship Is Rumored—Hagood's Removal Starts a Row—Vandenberg Won't Enter the Ohio Primary.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

MILITARISTS of Japan, led by a group of young army officers who were impatient with the government's policy of economy and restraint in the matter of advances in China and Mongolia, suddenly staged a revolt in Tokyo with the avowed purpose of eliminating liberal statesmen whom they considered obstacles to the restoration of a military dictatorship under imperial rule. Seizing certain government buildings in the capital, they rushed to the homes of the listed statesmen and succeeded in assassinating four—Premier Admiral Keisuke Okada; Admiral Viscount Makoto, former premier and lord keeper of the privy seal; Gen. Jotaro Watanabe, chief of military education, and Koreyiko Takahashi, finance minister. Several others were wounded, and servants of all of them were killed.

Emperor Hirohito

Emperor Hirohito immediately took charge of the situation, called a council of state and made Fumio Goto temporary premier. Martial law was proclaimed in Tokyo and the loyal army forces, largely outnumbering the rebels, surrounded the latter in the buildings they had taken. Meanwhile the second fleet, also loyal, moved up to the mouth of Tokyo bay, its guns dominating the city.

During the first day of the uprising an agreement was reached that the rebel troops should return to their barracks, but this they refused to do. Then the censorship, temporarily raised, was clamped down again. Diplomatic quarters in Shanghai received a report that Gen. Sadao Araki, former minister of war, had established a military dictatorship. He has been the most chauvinistic of all Japan's high army officers.

Political observers in Tokyo believed that the emperor's advisers would urge the right wing elements to be given a chance to form a cabinet, to see whether they would be able to conduct the government.

Even liberal political sources shared this belief, confident that such an experiment would produce a strong public reaction to the left, permitting early restoration of a normal government.

SENATE and house conferees patched up the new farm bill, substitute for the invalidated AAA, both houses accepted the revised measure and it was sent to the White House. Senator Borah argued in vain especially against the so-called "consumers'" amendment which authorizes the "re-establishment, at as rapid a rate as the secretary of agriculture determines to be practicable and in the general public interest, of the ratio between the purchasing power of the net income per person on farms and the income per person not on farms that prevailed during the five-year period August, 1909, to July, 1914."

Speaking of the extraordinary delegation of power to the secretary of agriculture, Senator Borah said: "We are now asked to confer upon him a task which would require omnipotence. It is manifestly on the face of it an absurdity.

"This idea that even by divine power you can go out and equalize the purchasing power of the producer and equalize the purchasing power of the laborer, when above them both is a power which is fixing a rule under which they live, is to me inconceivable."

ON THE ground that the seed loan requirements of farmers can be met from relief funds on hand, President Roosevelt vetoed the $50,000,000 crop production bill passed by congress. In his message he called attention to his budget message urging that congress provide additional taxes if it enacted legislation imposing charges not covered in the budget. He said he expected, last year, that such loans as the seed loan would be tapered off. He realizes they still are necessary but added:

"I am fully convinced that the immediate and actual need to which I have referred can be met during the year 1936 by an expenditure of funds materially less than that proposed in the bill under discussion."

SUMMARY removal of Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood from his command of the Eighth Corps area because of his critical expressions concerning the WPA and other New Deal activities stirred up a pretty row in Washington. Gen. Malin Craig, chief of staff, signed the order to Hagood, by order of the secretary of war and the President. The Republicans in congress, backed up by Tom Blanton of Texas and some other Democrats, assailed the action vigorously, and Senator Metcalf of Rhode Island introduced a resolution for an inquiry into the incident on behalf of "free speech."

Gen. Hagood

Breaking its "usual rule of silence," the War department made public a letter from General Craig to Secretary Dern, declaring Hagood's record was "marked by repeated examples of lack of self-control, irresponsible and intemperate statements."

Hagood had told a house subcommittee that it was "almost impossible" to get WPA's "stage money" for "anything worthwhile." These remarks, said Craig, "can only be characterized as flippant in tone and entirely uncalled for and designed to bring ridicule and contempt upon civil agencies of the government."

Accusing him of "thinly veiled" opposition and "contempt" toward War department policies in the past, Craig pointed out as "contemptuous" Hagood's references to CCC activities as "hobbies," "collecting postage stamps" and "taking an interest in butterflies."

Seeking a quick settlement of the controversy, Senator Byrnes, Democrat, and Representative McSwain, Democratic chairman of the house military affairs committee, both of whom hail from Hagood's home state of South Carolina, arranged a conference with Secretary of War Dern. This had no result.

SENATOR VANDENBERG of Michigan has formally declined to enter the Ohio Presidential primary, but does not bar himself from consideration for the Republican nomination. Writing to the Republican state committee of Ohio, in reply to an inquiry as to whether he would run, Vandenberg asserted his "sole interest" in the Republican convention was that it should make "the wisest possible decisions respecting both party leadership and party policies."

To conform to Ohio law, the Borah forces have found the required "second choice." This is Frank E. Gannett of Rochester, N. Y., publisher of a chain of newspapers, who has agreed to fight alongside the Idaho senator for Ohio's 52 delegates, to receive the votes of those pledged to Borah should the nomination of the latter be blocked in the convention. Mr. Gannett has expressed the belief that Borah is the one member of the party "most likely to recover the upstate New York vote," and he also holds the view that the Idahoan would be the strongest candidate in the agricultural states.

WHILE waiting for instructions as to what to do in the matter of taxation, the members of the house—and many others—directed their attention to the investigation of the activities of the Townsend pension plan promoters. Speaker Byrns appointed on the probing committee of eight two avowed Townsendites—John H. Tolan, Democrat, and Samuel L. Collins, Republican, both from California. The chairman is J. Jasper Bell of Missouri, Democrat, author of the resolution for the investigation. It was understood that Mr. Bell had already gathered a mass of information to substantiate the charge that the Townsend plan has become a huge racket. The leaders of both parties in congress have been getting rather nervous over the growth of the Townsend movement and are glad to see it attacked; but some impartial observers call attention to the fact that the way the committee is going after it smacks of unconstitutional abridgement of the right to petition.

J. Jasper Bell

It was expected that one of the first questions to be considered by the committee would be the salaries received by Dr. Francis E. Townsend, author of the scheme, and R. E. Clements, former California real estate operator, co-founder and general manager.

SENATOR NYE of North Dakota is determined that the war profits bill devised by his munitions committee shall be brought up for consideration at this session. Indeed he more than threatens a filibuster to bring this about, if necessary, to get the measure out of the hands of a finance subcommittee which is headed by Tom Connally of Texas, one of Nye's bitterest opponents.

The Nye bill provides for stiff taxes on earnings and virtual confiscation of individual income above $10,000 a year in time of war. In addition it would empower the President virtually to conscript industrial leaders to maintain production of essential war supplies.

UNEXPECTEDLY revolting against administration direction, the house voted down, 172 to 164, the bill to exempt from state and local taxation bank stocks held by the Reconstruction corporation. A similar measure passed the senate 38 to 28 the day before. The defeat was surprising because the measure had been unanimously supported by Republicans and Democrats on the house banking committee. Democratic leaders expressed the belief that the measure would not be revived.

The legislation was written after the Supreme court held in a Maryland bank case that the stocks held by RFC were subject to taxation.

GOV. EUGENE TALMADGE is virtually financial dictator of Georgia, because the general assembly did not enact an appropriation bill, but he is having his troubles finding funds to carry on. He declared there was a "plan hatched in Washington" to hamper him, and ousted State Treasurer George Hamilton and Controller General William Harrison for refusal to honor treasury warrants. Hamilton removed all the money from the treasury vault to a bank. Three state departments provided funds for temporary operation of fiscal affairs.

Then depository banks, the United States post office and the state's attorney general took a hand. Mail addressed to the suspended officers was impounded, cutting off the flow of tax remittances; all but one of the depository banks refused to honor state checks pending a court decision on the legal status of de facto officials; and Attorney General M. J. Yeomans, once cited by Talmadge as an authority for his actions, declared his position had been misinterpreted.

DEATH took from the scene two men prominent in national life—Albert Cabell Ritchie, governor of Maryland for four terms, and Henry Latrobe Roosevelt, assistant secretary of the navy and distant cousin of the President. Mr. Ritchie was a leader among conservative Democrats, from the start a determined foe of national prohibition, and in 1932 a candidate for the Presidential nomination by his party. Though beaten out by F. D. Roosevelt, he had the satisfaction of seeing his repeal plank put into the Democratic platform. Of late he had been an outspoken critic of the New Deal policies, for he was a champion of state rights.

A. C. Ritchie

Henry L. Roosevelt was the fifth member of his family to serve as assistant secretary of the navy, and in recent months he had played an increasingly important part in the affairs of the department, acting as secretary during the illness of Secretary Swanson. He was a student in the naval academy class of 1909, but left before graduation to become a second lieutenant in the marine corps, in which service he rose to the rank of colonel.

POLITICAL conditions in Puerto Rico, notoriously unsatisfactory, may be rectified as a result of the assassination in San Juan of E. Francis Riggs, chief of the insular police, and a district police chief. Riggs, a former United States army colonel, was shot by two Nationalists; two hours later District Police Chief Francisco Velez N. Ortiz attempted to put down a Nationalist riot at Utuado and was killed.

Gov. Blanton Winship announced that a full inquiry into the incidents would be energetically pushed. Deploring the slaying of Riggs as "dastardly," he asserted a revival of capital punishment and a ban against carrying of firearms, being urged upon the legislature, would prevent such crimes.

The assassins of Riggs were caught and admitted the killing, saying it was in revenge for the Rio Pedras "massacre" in which police killed four Nationalists last November. While being questioned, the murderers, the police said, reached for guns and were shot to death.

DEVELOPMENTS in Washington lead to the belief that the Copeland ship subsidy bill has been abandoned. Word came from the White House that the President, although he initiated the principles of the measure, would not press for its passage; and Senator Royal S. Copeland, whose commerce committee approved the bill which was a part of the administration program, is so irritated that he may drop it. Senator Guffey of Pennsylvania has prepared a rival measure, not yet introduced.

Sen. Copeland

Shipping interests have given warning that new construction for foreign trade will continue to be paralyzed by uncertainty and lead to additional insistence by the Navy department on the building of its own auxiliaries.

CAPT. ANTHONY EDEN, British foreign minister, stood up in the house of commons and warned the world that recurrence of the World war was imminent and in his opinion could not be averted except by a system of collective security "embracing all nations in an authority which is unchallenged and unchallengeable."

Eden impressed upon members of the parliament the difference between a policy of collective security and one of encirclement, such as the "ring of steel" which Germany complains is being forged about her by France. "The British government will have no lot or part in encirclement," Eden said.

MUSSOLINI had an ambitious plan for a five-power agreement that would embrace Italy, Germany, Austria, Poland and Hungary. But when it was submitted to Hitler he declined to enter the combination. However, the reichsfuehrer, it is said, told Mussolini Germany looks with sympathy on the stand Italy has taken.

Hitler pointed out that Germany is at present economically and militarily weak and needs a breathing spell to recruit her forces. He cannot therefore do anything at present that is likely to draw the hostility of France and Great Britain, but he will maintain an attitude of benevolent neutrality toward Italy.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

FAMOUS WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington.—The "hammer and saw" man is the target of a very real drive now under way by the building trades. He's the little chap, with his "office under his hat," who buys a lot, hires half a dozen neighbors, builds a small residence, sells it, and then looks for another job.

To the building trades that chap is just a chiseler. He does not pay union wages. He cuts all the corners, and normally his one item of expense, which is bigger than it should be, is that, not being too good a risk, he usually pays liberally for any money he borrows to finance his operations.

The "hammer and saw" man has been benefiting enormously from Federal Housing administration operations. More often than not loans for improvements and the construction of individual houses made work for him. The individual borrowing cheap money from the government to finance either an improvement or a new house seldom went to a big contractor. He went to a "hammer and saw" man.

Which is the real explanation for union labor in general, and the building trades in particular, going so strongly for the PWA type of housing rather than the little individual loans. So-called "slum clearance" projects don't us "hammer and saw" men. They use big contractors, and big contractors almost invariably have to use union labor.

Any large operation, whether of the slum clearance type or not, moves in the same direction.

Despite the much-talked-about split in the building trades unions, which by the way has now been healed—though no one is quite sure who came out on top—these particular unions have been very successful so far in having their way in turning and diverting government objectives.

Most important of these was the early desire to cut labor costs in housing. In the first government announcements these costs were to be cut in several ways. One was on the high cost of financing—stiff interest rates on mortgages and second trusts. It is generally conceded that the government has reduced these costs materially.

Labor Costs Stick

But another element which was to be reduced was the labor costs. Statements of plans were given wide publicity. The idea was that bricklayers, carpenters and plasterers, for instance, were paid scales of wages out of all proportion to work of similar skilled mechanics on the theory that the number of days' work they could get in the course of a year was limited and uncertain. Weather affected their employment, and one job might not start as soon as another was finished.

The government proposed to correct all this by providing steadier work, and virtually arranging, if not guaranteeing, a given number of days' work every year. It approached the "yearly wage" idea so appealing to some economists.

But the union labor boys did not take to it at all. They have been saboting it very skillfully. As a result, no one hears any more about it now. Certainly not from any of the government housing officials. It is considerably deader than NRA, because one does not even hear of any little local applications of it.

Another menace that the building trades unions think they have met successfully so far is the pre-fabricated house. President Roosevelt was enormously interested in this, and had numerous discussions with heads of some big corporations, thinking this was an excellent plan for providing better homes by the mass production method, just as the automobile companies have provided cheaper cars.

Helping the labor unions on this was the insistence of all the big companies involved on loading down the pre-fabricated houses with their own gadgets, with the result that the houses were too expensive. But union labor has discouraged development of this idea in other ways.

Prediction: Lower interest rates may be here to stay, but lower labor costs aren't coming.

Delights Roosevelt

The most delighted man in Washington over the Father Coughlin-Chairman O'Connor controversy is Franklin D. Roosevelt. For a very long time indeed the Detroit priest has been getting in the President's hair. In the early days of the administration, of course, Father Coughlin was very helpful. But then in the early days Roosevelt didn't need much help. The country seemed to be behind him 100 per cent. Even two years after his own election, the country increased the stranglehold the Democrats had on Capitol Hill by voting a most unprecedented endorsement for an off year.

But now is something else, and the President has been growing more and more irritated at the Coughlin attacks. He has realized fully the danger of the attacks from the other extreme—the conservatives who think the administration is spendthrift mad, and is piling up a debt, which will burden children yet unborn. In fact, he has been trimming his sails just a bit to meet that attack.

But right along with it to have Coughlin rousing against him the very people his policies are supposed to benefit most, the submerged tenth, was too much. Hence the desire to have someone take Coughlin's measure, and make him look foolish before the whole country.

A very delicate religious question was involved. Coughlin could call names. He could intimate that certain politicians have sold out to vested interests, but the danger in hitting back was great. Many Catholics, it was thought, who might not agree with Coughlin at all, might be seriously offended if the sort of attacks regarded as necessary were made.

Not an Accident

So it was far from an accident that John J. O'Connor, Irish Catholic, prominent member of Tammany Hall, and potent member of the oligarchy that rules the house of representatives, did the return mud slinging—promising to kick Coughlin around the streets of Washington, and alluding to his profits from silver speculation.

It is true that O'Connor, on second thought, went before the house and said his threat to kick Father Coughlin was "undignified" and that "I apologize" for the manner in which he referred to "clerical garb," but he went on to repeat his charges that Father Coughlin profited by silver speculation.

O'Connor said he would have kept his temper had not the priest indulged in a personal attack on him with reference to a bill he introduced, which was vetoed by the President. O'Connor said he could have stood for being called a "tool of Wall Street and an assassin"—even on a Sunday—until "he charged me with being a burglar."

The first stories about the irate Mr. O'Connor's listening to the radio, and then dashing off his wire impulsively, seemed in character, and were interesting, but they omitted one very significant feature. Mr. O'Connor had a long talk with President Roosevelt after the radio address and before sending his telegram inviting the priest to Washington to be kicked.

Conviction among New Dealers, is that O'Connor's various smashes will be very effective in destroying the nuisance value of Coughlin. First, it serves notice that if Coughlin is going to be a politician he must take as well as give blows. They think the effect will be rather harmful to Coughlin's present doubling in brass, so to speak. There was careful consideration given to the words about kicking Coughlin down the street, clerical garb and all. Obviously it would have been rather untactful for a Protestant to have said that.

Raising the Money

Non-political tax experts in the Treasury department believe there are only two ways of raising the amount of money the United States government must have in the way of new taxes, if not immediately, certainly after election.

One is by going after the small income folks, reducing exemptions and boosting the rates. The other is by a general sales tax.

Incidentally they do not agree with certain prominent New Dealers, who want to boost corporation income taxes on a sliding scale. But it must always be remembered that these experts have no power. They just advise treasury officials, and, when called in, the two congressional committees having jurisdiction over taxes—finance in the senate and ways and means in the house.

At the present moment, these experts point out, if the United States were raising all the money it is spending by taxation, levies in this country would be higher than in England per individual. Which is rather a blow to the idea, so widely advertised here that the British taxpayer groans under a terrible load, whereas in America taxes are pretty light, comparatively.

It is perfectly true, they admit, that such a picture can be drawn with respect to the very small income tax payers of both countries. People in that class are hit much harder in Britain than in the United States.

Per Capita Tax

For the year 1935, the tax experts say, the per capita tax in the United States—adding all taxes, whether federal, state or local—was $81. In Great Britain, for the same year, and again adding all taxes, it was $98.

But now for the bad news. For the same year total governmental expenditures in the United States, again adding in the local expenditures of states, counties, towns, etc., were $135 per capita. Whereas in Great Britain they were $117.

So that the rate of governmental spending in the United States is $18 more for every man, woman and child than is the governmental spending in Britain!

To put it another way, the various government units of Great Britain were going "in the red" for the year 1935 at the rate of $19 for every man, woman and child. But the government of the United States, plus its local governments, was going in the red to the tune of $54 for every man, woman and child.

SYNOPSIS

John Spencer and his cousin, Geoffrey Bohun, are vacationing in Austria. Geoffrey is a gifted portrait painter but prefers to paint landscapes. While strolling in the forest, John hears English voices, and decides to investigate. From safe cover he finds four men burying a man in green livery who, evidently, had been murdered. Pharaoh is the leader of the gang; the others are Dewdrop, Rush and Bugle. Unfortunately, John makes himself known to the assassins by dropping a letter with his name and address. He tells Geoffrey and his chauffeur, Barley, of his adventure. Geoffrey, realizing that John's life is in danger, declares he must vanish. Spencer discovers that the livery of the murdered man corresponds to the livery of the servants of Yorick castle, and tells Countess Helena, mistress of the castle, what he had seen. With Geoffrey and Barley, John starts for Annabel, a nearby village. They encounter Pharaoh. In making their getaway they exchange shots with the gang, without serious result. They arrive at Plumage farm, on the Yorick estate, where Lady Helena had requested John and his cousin to meet her. She reveals to them that her father had converted his immense fortune into gold sovereigns and hidden them away in a secret vault in the castle. Knowing that his son, Valentine, Helena's brother, was incapable of controlling the fortune, he had revealed it to Helena alone just before his death. In some manner the news had leaked out, and Pharaoh was after the treasure. They planned that Geoffrey and Barley would go to Salzburg to watch for Pharaoh, while John was to remain at Plumage, lying low in the daytime and patrolling the roads about Yorick from dusk to dawn. Several nights go by without important incident. John visits Yorick castle and finds that Helena's brother, Count Valentine, is there and with him, on most friendly terms, is Pharaoh, as Captain Faning. Hearing that John is stopping at Plumage, Pharaoh speaks to Dewdrop. John suspects a plot.

The door of a tower was open, and Helena whipped inside. She fled upstairs and into the pleasantest bedroom I ever saw. As I followed her in, she pressed a key into my hand.

"There's a door behind that curtain."

While I was unlocking this, she twitched a coat from a cupboard and rushed to the painted table on which were combs and brushes and all things that women use.

"Have you money, John?"

"About fifty pounds," said I.

"Good."

Then she threw one look around and slipped out of the room.

"Lock it behind us, John."

A short stone stairway brought us into a little hall which was very dimly lighted and was shut by three massive doors.

"The right-hand one," said Helena. "Quick. That's a master key."

We now encountered a winding flight of steps. At the foot of this flight we came to another door, but I could not see to unlock it, so Helena took the key.

And then we were out in some passage and there on our right was a postern that gave to the outside world. But Helena turned instead to a very much smaller door, sunk deep in the wall.

A man was coming. I could hear his steps on the stone. He was out of sight, round some corner, but he was not twelve paces away.

Helena's fingers were shaking, as she fitted the master key. The lock was stiff and defied the efforts she made. As I put out my hand, I heard the man stop and swear. Then he turned on his heel and began to retrace his steps.

An instant later the door was locked behind us and we were alone in the dark.

Helena was trembling, and I put my arm about her and held her close.

"Reaction," she murmured. "I'll be all right directly. You see, we're safe for the moment. I—I'd like to sit down."

With my arm about her, we sat ourselves down on a step.

"I'm all right now," breathed Helena, lifting her head.

I let her go, and she sat back against the wall.

"Listen, John. We couldn't have crossed the drawbridge without being seen. And that would have been ruination. . . . But now we've just disappeared. The doors that were open are open, and the doors that were locked are locked. But we have vanished. This stairway leads to a grating in the wall of the moat. It's just above the water. Directly below it, under the water and, therefore, out of sight, is a footbridge of stone. That leads across the moat to another grating set in the opposite wall. The gratings are barred—not locked, and each of them's barred on this side. The farther grating admits to an old brick tunnel that will lead us under the meadows and into the woods." She got to her feet. "And now we must go. We've not a moment to lose. The ramparts don't overlook this part of the moat, and we simply must get to Plumage before Bugle and Rush."

Carefully we descended the stair, which was very damp.

The water was cold and the iron of the gratings was rusted and very harsh, but the footbridge gave good foothold and our passage was made with an ease for which I had not dared hope. Since the water came up to my loins, I made Helena lie across my shoulders and carried her over like that.

As I set her on her feet in the tunnel, I heard the Count calling her name.

"Helena! Helena!"

I hauled myself out of the water to stand by her side.

"Helena, where are you?"

Gently I closed the grating.

Again the Count lifted his voice.

"Faning!" he bawled. "Faning!"

Helena touched my arm.

"I could tell him where Faning is. He's gone to the bridge. Nobody knows of this exit, but Florin and me."

The tunnel seemed without end. It was dark and damp and noisome and ran uphill, and I was more than thankful when after five or six minutes I saw the faint light of the evening and found the air more fresh. The mouth of the tunnel was masked by a riot of undergrowth, but when we were clear of this screen, I saw at once that we stood due north of the castle.

"And now for Axel," said Helena. "And Sabre, I hope. When he can't find me, he'll remember the last two nights and come to the Plumage ride."

It was now ten minutes past nine, and dusk had come in. We had, therefore, no fear of skirting the edge of the forest, for the going was better in the meadows and we were at least half a mile from where Axel would be.

The castle was lighted now as I had never seen it, but of course we could see no movement and hear no sound. The lights suggested that the building was being searched.

We pushed on breathlessly.

We had covered half the distance when Helena caught my arm and stopped in her tracks.

Somebody was whistling—not very far away; whistling as though to bring a dog to his heels.

Then we heard Pharaoh's voice.

"Good dog," he cried. "Good dog."

The man was out in the meadows, somewhere between the bridge and the Plumage ride.

In a flash I saw what had happened.

Sabre had left the castle, and Pharaoh had seen him go. The porter, no doubt, had told him that that was the Countess' dog, and the fellow had guessed in an instant that Sabre's instinct was leading him to his mistress, wherever she was. And so he had followed Sabre, but had lost him because it was dark.

"Come on," said I. "Now that he's lost Sabre, he hasn't a chance."

"If he hears the horses," breathed Helena.

We were nearly there now, but when Pharaoh whistled again, he was not so far off as before.

As we stumbled into the ride, I found the dog paddling beside us. He may have been there for five minutes for all I know. And there was Axel waiting, ten minutes before his time.

"Good dog," cried Pharaoh.

I judged the man to be fifty paces away.

In a flash I had Helena up on the lively gray.

As she stooped to whisper to Axel, I turned to the other horse, but, perhaps because he was startled, he would not stand. As I swung myself up, he backed sideways against the gray, and before I could find my right stirrup, its dangling iron had clashed with that of Helena, making a ringing sound.

The whistle which Pharaoh was letting suddenly stopped.

I heard the man running towards us as we turned the horses about.

And then we were both sitting down and riding hard for Plumage.

We dared not spare the horses—the hunt was up.

Pharaoh would run to the castle, find the Count and induce him to order a car; and we had to ride to Plumage and drive from there to the high road before that car could reach the mouth of the private lane.

As we came to the apron—

"I'll take the horses," said Helena. "You go and get your things."

As she caught my bridle, I flung myself off the bay.

In my bedroom I wasted no time, but snatched up a razor and seized the first clothes I found; yet, ere I was back, the horses were fast in the stables and Helena was returning to take her seat in the Rolls.

Thirty seconds later the Rolls slid over the bridge.

* * * * * * *

I had often read and heard speak of "an agony of apprehension," but never until that evening, when our headlights sent darkness packing out of that lovely lane, had I understood that terrible state of mind.

Then all at once the truth stood clear before me, and something more sinister than fear took hold of my heart.

The lane was no lane, but a trap—full two miles long. Once we were in, we could no more turn the Rolls round than a man that was buried could turn himself round in his grave.

If only we had stuck to the horses and ridden away across country to take some train. . . . But it was too late now. For better or worse we had chosen this dreadful way.

I set my teeth; and we took the rise before us with the rush of a lift.

As the Rolls swept over the crest, for an instant I lifted my foot—and then in a flash all my suspense was over and its grip was torn from my heart.

Two miles ahead a car had turned into the lane.

Helena caught my arm.

"That's the Carlotta. I know it. What can we do?"

For some extraordinary reason my senses were now as lively as they had been lately dull. I knew no hesitation; my confidence was sublime.

"We back," I said quietly. "What a mercy we hadn't got further. As it is, we've plenty of time. They can't do a mile a minute along this lane."

"But, John—"

I patted her blessed hand.

"Don't worry, my dear. It's all right. Little Arthur has got an idea," and, with that, I put out my headlights and started to take the Rolls back by the glow which her tail-lamp threw.

Two minutes later I backed her over the bridge.

"Can you see their headlights?" I asked.

"Not yet."

I began to swing around to the right, leaving the roadway and backing onto the turf. When I had gone thirty paces, I threw out the clutch.

At once we heard the Carlotta and a moment later we saw the glow of her lights.

The two of us sat in silence, listening and watching, while Pharaoh "came down like the wolf on the fold."

I do not think we were excited—the danger was past. We now were simply waiting for a car to get out of our way.

And so she did.

Well clear of the beam of her headlights, we watched her sweep down the slope and over the bridge; and as she went by to the apron, I let the Rolls leap forward and take her place on the road.

My lights were dimmed and I do not think that they saw us, for their eyes, of course, were looking the opposite way; but in any event the start which we had was deadly, for they must turn the Carlotta and we had the faster car.

As we floated in silence, I touched my companion's sleeve.

"And now where?" said I.

"We'll go to my nurse at Pommers. Her husband's a farmer there, and they'll see us through. And we'll wire to your cousin to join us and start from there."

We had the ways all to ourselves, and, indeed, I believe that we were the only beings awake in that countryside. Twice we sang through a village and now and again we could make out the form of a homestead beneath the trees. So for some 35 miles.

Then the engine of the Rolls coughed twice, and the car slowed down.

As I frowned, the truth came pelting—to sear my brain.

"What is it, John? What is it?"

"Petrol," I said hoarsely. "I meant to fill up before we patrolled this evening; but with all this Pharaoh business—"

"What Is It, John? What Is It?"

The nearest village lay roughly 11 miles off, and whether it boasted a pump we could not tell.

Carefully I surveyed our surroundings.

The road was a main highway. If I locked her switch and her bonnet, no man could take the Rolls, but, left on the road, she was bound to attract attention—the very sort of attention we wished so much to avoid.

Some forty-five paces ahead a track led into the forest—a decent track; what was more, it ran slightly downhill. If I could manhandle the Rolls as far as its mouth, her weight would help me to carry her out of sight. But the road, though level, was cambered.

While Helena steered and stood by to apply the brake, I moved the Rolls by the spokes of one of her wheels. The strain was great, for the car was very heavy, and the camber made such a gradient as I could not overcome. In desperation I moved her perhaps six inches towards the crown of the road, but then the weight of her beat me, and she began to return; and in my effort to hold her before I could cry for the brake I strained or tore some muscle in the small of my back.

I smothered a grunt of pain—too late for Helena's ears, before I had drawn myself up, my lady was standing beside me and asking me how I did.

"You've hurt yourself, John."

"A muscle," said I. "It's nothing. As long as I don't use it, I'll be all right." Ruefully I regarded the Rolls. "But we'll have to leave her here. As far as shifting her goes, I've shot my bolt."

If Five Dictators Unite
England Is Feverish
Wealth for a Good Gir!
Gen. Mitchell Finds Rest

Rome hints that Mussolini and Hitler have arranged a protective treaty with Austria, Poland and Hungary. Five countries under dictators, united against England and France, still experimenting with the old "democracy," would be interesting.

Arthur Brisbane

One dictator, Stalin, supposed to have an understanding with France, might offset the other combination.

Also, Hitler will remember that in 1914 Germany thought she had Italy in a "triple alliance"—Italy-Austria-Germany, but Italy did not stay. Had she stayed, the war might have ended otherwise. That increases Mussolini's bitterness, with England trying to cause Italy's defeat by barbarous Ethiopia.

Mr. Eden, young foreign secretary, tells England modern conditions are "dreadfully" like conditions before 1914. England must arm herself to the teeth and have, for final objective, "a world-wide system of collective security which embraces all nations in an authority which is unchallenged and unchallengeable."

That might be done by two or three countries closely united, although the airplane makes everything in war uncertain. It might destroy a capital city and an alliance in one morning, as a pistol destroys the strongest man.

Countess Barbara Hutton Haugwitz-Reventlow has a new baby boy weighing seven and a half pounds, and twenty million dollars; that in gold at the present price would weigh more than thirty thousand pounds. Ask Barbara Hutton Haugwitz-Reventlow, as she holds that small baby, its eyes not focused, one small hand holding her finger, whether she would rather have the baby or the $20,000,000, and she will think your question silly. She would not take a million millions for the baby.

This proves that any good young woman who marries a kind young man may be richer than any "five and ten" heiress.

Gen. William E. Mitchell was buried in the family burial plot in Milwaukee, not in Arlington cemetery.

Having fought all his life against the enemies of his country and the stupidity of his superiors, he wanted peace at the last.

He lies beside his father, a United States senator from Wisconsin.

General Mitchell has gone wherever patriotic, brave men go; some that opposed him will not follow him there.

At Greenwood Lake, N. Y., a mail-carrying rocket went 2,000 feet from New York to New Jersey over Greenwood lake, while spectators smiled in derision.

Other spectators smiled when Fulton tried his first steamboat.

In Madison, Wis., death masks of Indians, more than 3,000 years old, found in burial grounds, lead back to savages of the Eskimo type that hunted mammoths near the beautiful Wisconsin lakes 15,000 years ago. Those ancient savages, instead of burying the dead, cleaned the skeletons neatly, covered the skulls with lifelike masks of clay, kept their relatives with them for years.

The human race has done queer things always. Russia has Lenin, embalmed, exhibited in the great Red square of Moscow.

The world becomes gradually democratic. In King George's funeral procession everybody walked. At his father's funeral, the great all went on horseback, including King George's cousin, the former kaiser, on a prancing white horse.

Now King Edward VIII orders simpler uniforms, less fancy dressing in Buckingham palace.

President Lewis, fifty, head of the miners' union, plenty of cash on hand, offers William Green, American Federation of Labor head, $500,000 for a campaign to organize 500,000 men in the steel industry. Mr. Green, a long-time union man, has not accepted the offer. He knows how easy it is for one man to become a tail for the other man's kite.

Dr. Alfred Adler, competent psychologist, says the 'Dionne quintuplets "should be separated, for their own good."

Mothers will wonder how any psychologist could suggest separating the five small angels, Yvonne, Annette, Cecile, Emilie and Marie.

Mrs. Watson Davis, for Science Service, says the world needs just now: A remedy for the two greatest "killers of men," cancer and organic heart disease; a substitute for power, developed in primitive fashion from oil, coal, etc. That means harnessing the sun to one end of the scale, the atom at the other.

Harpooned Hippo Ambushes Boat; Stiff Battle Ensues

Angered because it had been harpooned a few days before, a hippopotamus lay in ambush and suddenly attacked a ferry boat operating on the Mpaologoma swamp, a well-known Uganda waterway, near Nairobi. Charge after charge was made by the infuriated beast, which nearly boarded the vessel, the water being shallow so that it could obtain a foothold. Six natives, armed with spears, fought the invader until the arrival of a European, who shot it, amid songs and cheers from the deck of another vessel speeding to the rescue.

DOCTORS KNOW

Mothers read this:

A cleansing dose today; a smaller quantity tomorrow; less each time, until bowels need no help at all.

Why do people come home from a hospital with bowels working like a well-regulated watch?

The answer is simple, and it's the answer to all your bowel worries if you will only realize it: many doctors and hospitals use liquid laxatives.

If you knew what a doctor knows, you would use only the liquid form. A liquid can always be taken in gradually reduced doses. Reduced dosage is the secret of any real relief from constipation.

Ask a doctor about this. Ask your druggist how very popular liquid laxatives have become. They give the right kind of help, and right amount of help. The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara — both natural laxatives that can form no habit, even in children. So, try Syrup Pepsin. You just take regulated doses till Nature restores regularity.

No Need to Suffer "Morning Sickness"

"Morning sickness"—is caused by an acid condition. To avoid it, acid must be offset by alkalis—such as magnesia.

Why Physicians Recommend Milnesia Wafers

These mint-flavored, candy-like wafers are pure milk of magnesia in solid form—the most pleasant way to take it. Each wafer is approximately equal to a full adult dose of liquid milk of magnesia. Chewed thoroughly, then swallowed, they correct acidity in the mouth and throughout the digestive system and insure quick, complete elimination of the waste matters that cause gas, headaches, bloated feelings and a dozen other discomforts.

Milnesia Wafers come in bottles of 20 and 48, at 35c and 60c respectively, and in convenient tins for your handbag containing 12 at 20c. Each wafer is approximately one adult dose of milk of magnesia. All good drug stores sell and recommend them.

RESOLUTIONS

WHEREAS, the budget principle was written into the Constitution it was understood that the available revenues would be distributed without any discrimination to meet each and every appropriation proportionately except, of course, payment of the public debt and the care of the State's wards; and for such operatoin of the budget it was hoped that there would result governmental economy nad efficiency; and,

WHERAS, the actual operation of the budget has been and is different and under the Court's construction of the budget law all appropriations are not prorated without discrimination, but public education is made to bear the brunt of all prorations, so that under the budget for the present fiscal year over 90% of the total loss by proration falls upon public education; and,

WHEREAS, this is obviously not a fair operation of a true budget principle, and can have no effect in bringing about economy in the operation of all those departments and State agencies whose appropriations are not reduced by proration, but can result only in starving public education and in depriving the children of our State of a fair dea; and,

WHEREAS, an educated citizenry is a prime essential to the well-being and progress of the State;

NOW, THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED by the MONTEVALLO CIVIC CLUB that we do strongly urge upon the Governor, the Legislature and the People of Alabama that this inequity be corrected by constitutional amendment, that a true budget principle be adopted and enforced, and that appropriations for public education be not discriminated against, but rather be placed at least on a parity with other appropriations; and to the accomplishment of that just end we pledge our active and wholehearted support.

Spring Hat Bright Spot on Horizon

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

BUY yourself a new spring hat and turn the dirge of winter into a joyous spring song. Bright spots on the horizon are the fashion "firsts" now showing in millinery previews. Which is not figuratively speaking but literally true, for the new hats are going in for color in a big way.

It is to smile at the wee size of many of them. Not much larger than your hand, are early arrivals from Paris. Go hat hunting and prove it for yourself. The less the hat the more the chic, so designers are telling us. How to anchor these diminutive yet eye-filling bits of millinery on the head at just the most fetching lilt and tilt, aye, that's the trick. Ask your milliner. It takes experience to acquire the knack, we admit.

But cheer up. Come veils, to the rescue! They tone up a hat no matter how diminutive and make it look "fit." Veils in countless number adorn the new hats. It is a frolicsome mood they are in, flying every which way, sometimes pretending they are veils when they are really trimming. They make pretty headgear look prettier to the point of fascination.

Flowers, too! Which is important news. To be sure there have been rumors and rumors of flowers but this time milliners declare they are a sure thing. It is not only that "flowers is flowers" on the new hats, but really and truly news about them is their novel positioning — perky bouquets dropped atop crowns or slanted athwart forehead lines at dashing incline or posing on bandeaux or standing at attention at the front, thus the new flower treatments repeat and repeat.

While we started out telling of the tininess of some of the new hats, please do not conclude that every new spring model has been reduced to postage stamp size. On the contrary some of the smartest numbers on the style program have brims. Shallow-crowned sailors are all the go, especially the Breton types which are shown in felt or stitched silk, and the latest swagger note is the Breton made of gay patent leather. Then, too, the hat with a visor made of silk, quilted or stitched, is very popular. Young girls are charmed with the idea of the new "Rose of the Ranch" hat with its wide round rolled-up brim and that which captures fancy most of all, its chin strap of fancy cord. Also in this class is the new Argentina type which likewise boasts a chin strap. As to the new swagger soft mannish felts, their vogue is assured.

We are following up our statement about hats of Lilliputian size by including two such in the accompanying illustration. To the right in group is a Paris model which goes to verify this new trend. It is a toque of dotted grosgrain, trimmed at the back with a feather and a veil which is not a veil. However, this bow of open mesh conveys an important message of veiling tied in bows and we might add matching bows at the throat are cited in fashion reports. To the left is another wee toque as fashion decrees for spring. A flange of geraniums and the inevitable little veil do the trimming act.

The off-the-face hat above proclaims the existing flair for gay color. It is a bright Chinese red straw. Band and bow are of black belting ribbon. The print gown is black and white.

A very smart shallow navy straw Breton concludes the group. The bouquet atop the crown and the inset about the headline are made of multicolored leather.

DINNER JACKET

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Wear a dinner jacket wth your slim-skirted formal print frock if you would look up-to-the-instant good style. White cotton pique is considered ever so smart for the dinner jacket. Indeed, these white washable jackets are proving quite the fad of the immediate moment. A white cotton pique dinner jacket, flared at the hips, adds a tailored note to a printed silk crepe frock as here shown. The dress has splashy flowers of red and blue on white with a decolletage cut high in front and low in back.

New Hats Exhibit Varied Sources of Inspiration

The new hats exhibit very definite but also varied sources of inspiration. A collection of one designer will show the influence of several different periods and contrasting styles. Talbot, for instance, while seeking ideas for her new berets in supple shirred rayon velvet from the portraits of Dante, has adopted for her new fur toques the Russian and Asiatic styles with a pointed and sometimes folded crown.

CHINESE MODE SEEN IN PARIS FASHIONS

China put an oriental sign on the new spring mode shown in 1936 fashion displays.

Chinese lacquer red appeared in trimmings, Chinese motifs marked belt buckles and Chinese figures were stamped on prints.

Many black afternoon frocks were designed along simple, highnecked lines, suggestive of oriental suavity. Some black dinner frocks were topped by knee-length coats of flower printed black cire silk, whose cut showed Chinese inspiration.

A slender silhouette, high neckline and accented shoulderline, marked by big topped sleeves gathered into the armhole, distinguish the Paris profile shown so far.

Waists are normal and busts are definitely outlined.

Smartest Black Costumes Touched With Vivid Colors

Bright touches either as trimming or in the way of accessories are dramatizing the season's smartest black costumes. Perhaps it will be embroidery done in vivid colored yarns or a row of striking red buttons or insets of red patent leather. As to accessories the most striking item is the new gloves which are being shown in high colors including red, green, dubonnet and the natural chamois shade is especially sponsored by smart Parisiennes.

Hearts of Fur Are Now Worn on Sleeves of Stylists

A sentimental wave has overtaken fashion in Paris. Women now literally wear their hearts on their sleeves—made of fur. Hats and gowns are perfumed. You can spray the padding with your own scent or with different scents on various occasions.

For evenings, too, you can increase your femininity by wearing little frilled tulle caps, which serve as a chignon.

Taffeta for Evening

Lots of taffeta is being shown for evening just now. There are pencil slim taffeta frocks, and there are billowy models. Slim, black taffeta with self-ruchings of clipped material is a favorite. Usually this is done with a very deep decolletage, both in front and back. White taffeta with glittering touches is liked, and for southern wear there are taffeta frocks in pale pink and blue.

Lesson for March 8

JESUS AND THE LAWYER

LESSON TEXT—Luke 10:25-37.

GOLDEN TEXT—Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself.—Luke 10:27.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus' Story of a Good Neighbor.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Who Is My Neighbor?

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How to Be a Good Neighbor.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Whose Neighbor Am I?

The subject, "Jesus Teaches Neighborliness," chosen by the lesson committee, deals only with one side of the question; namely, man's duty to his fellow men; whereas, his first duty is to God.

I. How to Inherit Eternal Life (vv. 25-28).

1. The lawyer's question (v. 25). The term "lawyer" here means "one versed in religious law, the Scriptures," not "lawyer" in our modern sense of that term. It more nearly corresponds to our theological professor. The lawyer's object was to trip Jesus, to induce him to take such a stand as would weaken his influence as a teacher.

2. Jesus' question (v. 26). "What is written in the law?" He sent him to the law, the field which was familiar to him. Jesus thus robbed him of his own weapon. Though Jesus knew the motive of the lawyer, he did not evade his question.

3. The lawyer's reply (v. 27). He made an intelligent answer, declaring that the entire content of the law was embraced in love to God and man.

4. Jesus' reply (v. 28). The straightforward answer went to the heart of the lawyer. Perfect love to God and man is truly the way of life. No man has yet had or can have such love. His sinful condition precludes its possibility. The lawyer keenly felt this thrust. He was defeated on his own grounds and, therefore, convicted of guilt.

II. "Who Is My Neighbor?" (vv. 29-37).

1. The lawyer's question (v. 29). "Who is my neighbor?" This question reveals the insincerity of the lawyer. Christ's answer had reached his conscience and now he seeks to escape the difficulty by asking a captious question.

2. Jesus' answer (vv. 30-37). Jesus' reply more than answered the lawyer's question. In the parable of the Good Samaritan he makes clear who is a neighbor, and also what it mean to be a neighbor and what loving a neighbor means. Christ's answer had a double meaning. He not only made clear "Who is my neighbor," but also that the lawyer was not playing the neighbor.

a. This destitute and wounded man, left on the wayside by the robbers, is a man who needs a neighbor. My neighbor, therefore, is the one who needs my help, whether he lives next door, or on the other side of the world. Love does not regard locality, nationality, or blood relation. Those who have the spirit of Christ can see their neighbors on every hand.

b. What being a neighbor means. Our supreme consideration should not be, "Who is my neighbor?" but "Whose neighbor am I?" To be a neighbor is

(1). To be on the lookout for those in need of help (v. 33). Love is always on a journey. It is keen to discern the needs of those with whom it is brought into contact.

(2). To have compassion on the needy (v. 33). Christ's compassion was aroused as he came into contact with those who were suffering and in need. Those who are Christlike will be likewise moved.

(3). To give to those in need (v. 34). Love does not calculate the cost of its actions. Whenever there is the calculation of cost there is the expression of selfishness. Many are willing to give money to help the poor and needy, but are unwilling personally to minister to them. Many times the personal touch is more important than the material aid.

(4). To bind up wounds. If we have eyes to discern we shall see many wounds about us that need attention.

(5). To set the helpless ones on our beasts while we walk (v. 34). This is the proof of the genuineness of our love. Those who are like Christ will deny themselves in order to have something to give to those in need.

(6). To bring to the inn and take care of the unfortunate (v. 34). Genuine love does not leave its service incomplete. Much Christian service is partial, leaving the man to take care of himself.

(7). To give money (v. 35). It costs a good deal to be a neighbor. Love is the most expensive thing in the world. It cost God his only Son; it cost Jesus Christ his life.

Goodness

There is an idea abroad among moral people that they should make their neighbors good. One person I have to make good; myself. But my duty to my neighbor is much more nearly expressed by saying that I have to make him happy if I may.

Our Road

We cannot always choose our road in life, but we can choose whether we walk along the shady or the sunny side of it.—G. A. Steel.

Bring Woodlands or Sea to the Reach of Flat-Dwellers

The vast ultra-modern flats of Austria and Germany usually have bare, windowless sides which might be used for commercial posters. But an artist has altered all that, says Tit-Bits Magazine. He painted scenic designs on the side of one, and so enraptured were the people that he soon obtained other commissions.

The craze caught on, and now dozens of houses have been decorated with ships, birds, vigorous figures in action, and all kinds of woodland scenes.

Boy Is Over Eight Feet Tall and Still Growing

Physicians say that Robert Wadlow of Alton, Ill., is still growing at the age of seventeen. That would not be unusual except for the fact that he is 8 feet 4 inches tall and weighs 390 pounds now. Wadlow is regarded as the nation's tallest man and the second tallest in history. A famous Irish giant of the Nineteenth century is said to have exceeded him.

Wadlow recently graduated from Alton high school. He wore a size 8½ cap and a 92-inch gown which was 50 inches around the chest and had 55-inch sleeves. His shoes are size 39. The youth expects to enter Shurtleff college next fall to study law and wants to finish at Washington university in St. Louis.

OF COURSE, you know that children should never drink coffee. But do you realize that the caffein in coffee disagrees with many grown-ups, too?

If you are bothered by headaches or indigestion; or find it difficult to sleep soundly . . . caffein may be to blame.

Isn't it worth while to try Postum for 30 days? Postum contains no caffein. It is simply whole wheat and bran, roasted and slightly sweetened. It is easy to make, and costs less than one-half cent a cup. It's a delicious drink, too . . . and may prove a real help. A product of General Foods.

FARMERS URGED TO VISIT EROSION CONTROL AREAS

If soil erosion is damaging your farm, jump into the family flivver some Sunday afternoon and visit one of the Soil Conservation Service demonstration areas in Alabama. This is one of the best times in the year to see what is being done to protect the soil.

These demonstration areas were established to apply in an intensive manner in a considerable area all known methods of erosion control and also to develop new methods. They are showing farmers how they can treat their own land to control erosion. There are three projects in Alabama, located near Dadeville, Greenville and Anniston.

With the cooperation of farmers, the best known methods of erosion control are applied on these project areas.

How terraces have stood up under the heavy rains of the winter and the effectiveness of check dams, strip-crops, cover crops, grasses and trees in controlling erosion may be seen on these areas.

Every person in Alabama, and particularly farmers, should visit at least one of the projects this spring and again in the summer when crops may be seen growing on treated fields.

Your County Agent or members of the staff of the Soil Conservation Service will gladly organize a tour of any project area at your con venience.

RECREATION TO BE FURTHERED IN SHELBY COUNTY

The State Department of Public Welfare in co-operation with the United States Children's Bureau, is sending Community Workers into 4 areas of the state. Shelby County is one of the four counties which will be included in area number two and served by Miss Margaret Hodo. Miss Hodo will be stationed in Montevallo, but her services will be available to all of Shelby County.

Through the Community Worker the Department of Public Welfare hopes to further the development of community organization nad recreation.

Since only one worker will be available to four counties, the amount of time she can spend in any one community will be limited It is hop ed, however, that such organigations as the Parent-Teacher Association, the American Legion, the Red Cross the Boy Scouts, the Girl Scouts, Civic Clubs, Federated Clubs, Y. M. C. A.'s, Y. W. C. A.'s, Church Auxiliaries, and other interested elubs and or ganizations will co-operate to make the Community Worker's services as valuable as possible.

Cotton To Be Used In Highway Tests

The United States Department of Agriculture has made available $1,300,000 to be used in stimulating field tests of new uses of cotton in highway construction.

Cotton materials will be furnished upon request to state highway departments so that they may be tested in widespread use under all climatic conditions. If the results are favorable as certain preliminary trials along these lines have indicated, these new fields of use would require large quantities of cotton in the future, says the official announcement.

DETAILS OF NEW A. A. A. PROGRAM ARE ANNOUNCED

By cooperation with the Government in the soil conservation program, Alabama farmers can increase their 1936 farm income by ten or eleven million dollars, announces Dr. L. N. Duncan, director of the State Extension Service, who wll administer the program.

A telegram received Saturday by Dr. Duncan from Washington states that the new program "provides two types of payments"--soil conserving payments, averaging $10 per acre within maximum acreage limits for the country as a whole, and soil building crops in 1936.

The payments on cotton will be 5 cents a pound for the normal yield of each acre diverted. Cotton payments will not be made for diversion of more than 35 per cent of the cotton base acreage for the individual farm

Details of the program will be carried to the farmers though county agents.

It is the people who come early to avoid the crowd that make the crowd.

The location is the brick building formerly occupied by the Knox Wooley Motor Company. Mr. Walton cordially invites his friends and former customers to visit him in his new location.

Cobb To Supervise Program This Area

The establishment of five regions comprising all the 48 states, for administration of the $500,000,000 Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act has been announced by Secretary Wallace.

Cully A. Cobb, who has been director of the Cotton Division, will be regional director of the Southern Division, which includes Alabama, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas and Oklahoma.

ALABAMA ACCEPTS NEW FARMING ACT

Alabama holds the distinction of being the first State in the nation to pass Legislation accepting the provisions of the new $470,000,000 Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act. The new farm program was accepted by a unanimous vote of the Legislature.

If the State makes provision for necessary cooperation in helping finance the administration of the act in Alabama, the new law will pave the way for farmers of the State to receive benefit payments of from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 annually, beginning in 1936, said Dr. L. N. Duncan, director of the State Extension Service, in complimenting the members of the Legislature on their prompt passage of Senate Bill No 102 by Senator Walden, of Headland and House Bill No. 268 by Parish of Henry County accepting the Act.

The bill passed by the Legislature designates the Extension Service to administer the new soil program in Alabama. This recognition, it was explained, was given the Extension Service because of its efficient manner of administering the AAA program through which Alabama farmers were paid almost $30,000,000 in benefit parity payments during the past three years.

The new law authorizes the Extension Service, in cooperation with farmers of the State to make a plan each year to promote soil conservation and other agricultural benefits.

It is expected that most States in the Union will pass legislation similar to that passed by the Alabama Legislature, as it is one of the requirements of the Federal law that such acts be passed before 1938 by all states which expect to participate in the program.

THE T. P. ROBERTS ZONE MEETING NEXT FRIDAY

The T. P. Roberts Zone Meeting will be held in Columbiana Methodist Church on next Friday from 10 A. M. until 1 P. M. o'clock. An interesting program has been arranged by Mrs. T. K. Roberts and representatives from Sylacauga, Talladega Vincent Wilsonville Anniston and Columbiana and other towns are expected to be present. All members are cordially urged to attend.

FARMERS WILL COOPERATE IN SOIL PROGRAM

A large percentage of Alabama farmers will cooperate in the $500,000,000 soil conservation and domestic allotment program report the county agents in all parts of the state. Many agents state that between 95 and 100 per cent of the farmers are planning to cooperate.

Half Million Farmers May Get Double Federal Benefits—New Processing Taxes Abandoned—Clements Quits as Townsend Plan Secretary.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

REXFORD G. TUGWELL, head of the rural resettlement administration, announced that a special committee is considering a plan under which more than half a million growers of farm products would receive double benefits from the federal government. It provides that the rural families now getting loans from Tugwell's administration to put them on their feet and keep them off the relief rolls may also receive full subsidy payments in connection with the soil conservation program now being put into operation. There are now 450,000 recipients of the Tugwell loans and the number is expected to increase to 525,000 by July 1.

R. G. Tugwell

The soil conservation subsidies are to be paid to farmers who transfer land from commercial crop production to soil conserving growths, or who resort to other "economic" farm practices. Officials said that the rehabilitation clients already are under obligation to treat their soil wisely. Before a family can obtain a rehabilitation loan it must agree to follow a farm management plan drafted by the government.

This plan stipulates that the borrower must conserve his land's fertility and grow food and feed crops for home consumption. It also includes a financial budget.

ONE of the major features of the new tax program suggested by President Roosevelt is omitted from the measure prepared by a house subcommittee and on which open hearings were begun by the ways and means committee. For political reasons it was decided that the plan for new processing taxes on farm and competing products should be abandoned. Mr. Roosevelt's suggestion for a "windfall" tax to recapture part of the refunded or unpaid AAA processing levies was accepted by the subcommittee.

A third suggestion of the President, for graduated taxes on the portions of incomes which corporations do not distribute in dividends to stockholders, was changed to provide levies on total income of corporations varied according to percentages of profits put into reserves.

The subcommittee agreed that the corporation tax rates should be so drafted as to permit corporations, particularly small ones, to build up reserves for lean years without being compelled to pay comparatively high taxes for the privilege of doing so.

The subcommittee figured on collecting some $25,000,000 from taxes on dividends going to foreigners who own stock in American corporations and $83,000,000 from temporary continuation of the capital stock and excess profits taxes.

JUST as Chairman C. Jasper Bell and his house committee were about to open their inquiry into the finances of the Townsend old age pension plan organization, Robert E. Clements, co-founder, secretary and director of the movement, resigned. He was summoned to be the first witness before the committee but said his resignation was not motivated by this, but was solely due to his opposition to political activities of other leaders of the organization. Dr. F. E. Townsend in Los Angeles expressed his "hearty approval" of Clements' action, and it was predicted other officials of the movement would follow the secretary's example.

R. E. Clements

Clements appeared before the committee with a great mass of records, ready to "account for every penny collected." Before testifying he said: "I have nothing to hide. I'm anxious to appear. I have been responsible for financing the Townsend plan. I have collected around $850,000 and the organizaton has spent about $750,000. There is still $100,000 on hand."

SEVERAL witnesses who appeared before a senate subcommittee declared that the Robinson-Patman anti-chain store bill, which has administration backing, would promote rather than curb monopolies, increase the cost and lower the standard of living, and decrease employment in whole industries.

The hearing was on the Borah-Van Nuys bill, a modification of the Robinson-Patman measure, but the witnesses particularly attacked the latter, which already has been reported favorably. The house judiciary committee reported the Utterback bill, still another modification of the Robinson-Patman measure, and a bitter fight over the proposed legislation is expected.

The Robinson-Patman bill would prohibit manufacturers from making price discriminations in favor of large quantity purchasers, through advertising allowances, service charges, brokerage fees, etc. The Borah-Nuys bill would prohibit such allowances only when they were refused to purchasers of goods of "like grade, quality, and quantity."

ONE of the big fights within the American Federation of Labor has been settled peacefully. It was for control of the building trades department. In the past, building projects have been held up by strikes growing out of arguments over which of two unions should do a certain piece of work. The peace pact provides for appointment of an impartial referee to settle such arguments.

The pact also called for J. W. Williams of the carpenters to head the reorganization department, with M. J. McDonough of the plasterers as secretary-treasurer. Each has been the leader of one of the warring factions and each has styled himself as the lawful department president.

BENITO MUSSOLINI evidently expects another European war, and in preparation for it he announced several drastic measures on the seventeenth anniversary of the founding of the Fascist party. He abolished the chamber of deputies, substituting for it a council of guilds; and he also eliminated the country's large industries, leaving the medium and small private industries in existence. This latter move, he told the council of the 22 guilds of the corporative state, was to increase the nation's economic self-sufficiency. "When and how war will come, one does not know," he said, "but the wheel of fate turns fast."

Benito Mussolini

Mussolini asserted the large industries, particularly those working for the defense of the nation, would be formed into organizations called "key industries." These, he said, "will be run directly or indirectly by the government. Some will have mixed organization."

HAVING sent Joachim von Ribbentrop back to London with a modified rejection of the four power plans for peace in western Europe, Hitler was preparing his counter proposals which British Foreign Minister Eden had requested. Meanwhile the reichsfuehrer continued his campaign tour, delivering rousing speeches in defense of his policies. Speaking in Ludwigshafen, in the heart of the remilitarized Rhineland, he said: "Those who want us to grovel on our knees before agreeing to talk with us forget we are not a tribe of savages, but a European nation looking back on thousands of years of culture.

"I stretch out my hand to France. We want peace for common sense reasons. Germany needs no more fame on the battlefield, but is now getting ready to seek laurels in the Olympic peace competition of nations. Men who relish the indecent thought of victor and vanquished are not statesmen. They must be silent when peace talks start."

Most of the continental statesmen who gathered in London to consider the Rhineland affair went home, some of them in very bad humor over the indecisive proceedings. The French, disinclined to consider any further proposals from Hitler, were urging that the French, British and Belgian general staffs get together on plans in accordance with the Locarno treaty.

IN CONNECTION with the signing of the new naval treaty by the United States, Great Britain and France, it was disclosed in London that the two first named powers have reaffirmed the 50-50 ratio for their fleets and again promised not to compete against each other in naval building. The new three power pact limits the size of battleships to 35,000 tons, retains 10,000 tons as the maximum for cruisers and provides no cruisers of that size shall be built for six years.

In the expiring Washington treaty there was an article regarding fortification of naval bases. This is not renewed in the new pact, and Japan requested information as to the future intentions of the powers. Consequently the United States, Great Britain and Japan were carrying on diplomatic conversations on that topic.

The new treaty gives the signatories certain liberty of action in the event of unforeseen naval activity by powers not signatory to the treaty. So far as America is concerned, this "escape clause" is taken to apply mainly to Japan.

FOURTEEN persons perished in Mexico's worst aviation disaster. A big trimotored plane carrying ten European tourists and four company employees crashed on the ridge between the volcanoes Popocatapetl and Ixtaccihuatl and there were no survivors to explain why it fell. Among the tourists were Prince Adolf of Schaumburg-Lippe and his wife, Princess Elisbeth.

KOKI HIROTA, the new liberal premier of Japan, declared in an interview: "While I am premier there will be no war"; and continued: "We intend to cultivate our traditional friendship with Great Britain, the United States, Russia, and other powers, thus fulfilling our great mission of stabilizing east Asia."

On the same day that Hirota made this pronouncement the soviet Russian government ordered its ambassador to Japan to lodge a strong protest following a new border engagement which Soviet advices said resulted from a Japanese attack on a Red frontier post. Fighting lasted for hours, entailing loss of life on both sides, said the reports.

FEDERAL reserve board has prescribed a 55 per cent minimum margin for purchases of stocks, the ruling becoming effective April 1 for stocks bought through brokers and May I for those bought through banks.

The margin regulations were made to apply only to listed securities on registered stock exchanges, thus having no effect upon the large over-the-counter market.

The maximum loan value applying to registered stocks has been fixed at 45 per cent of current market value.

WITH only one change, the house passed the senate bill to continue the Electric Home and Farm authority as a federal agency until February 1, 1937, or any earlier date decreed by the President. The authority was created to help finance sales of electrical appliances.

HENRY BOYLE SOMERVILLE, aged and retired vice admiral of the British navy, was murdered by gunmen at his residence at Castletownsend, County Cork, Irish Free State. Thrown through the door of the house was a card bearing these words:

"This British agent sent 52 Irish boys into the British army in the last few months. He will send no more."

The admiral had received previous threats because of his recruiting activities.

INTREPID citizens of scores of cities and towns in the eastern and New England states which were devastated by the unprecedented floods were digging out their homes and places of business from the mud and debris as the turbulent waters of many rivers subsided. Reconstruction and refitting began everywhere immediately, and this, as well as the relief of the suffering thousands, was aided by funds totaling more than $43,000,000 allocated by President Roosevelt before he left Washington for Florida.

Rough estimates were that the total dead in 13 states were 169; the homeless were 221,500, and the total property damage, $271,500,000. The last figure probably would be tripled if one took into account the losses from interruption to industry and trade and the stoppage of the wages of labor.

Cities along the lower Ohio were threatened as the flood waters raced down to the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico, but they had had plenty of warning and were in a measure prepared.

ISABELLA GREENWAY, the capable lady who has represented Arizona in congress since October, 1933, has announced in Tucson that she will retire from public life at the conclusion of her present term. She was first elected for the remainder of the term of Lewis Douglas, who resigned to become director of the budget, and was re-elected in 1934.

Mrs. Greenway

Mrs. Greenway owns and operates several ranches in Arizona and New Mexico and a hotel in Tucson, and is also interested in some mining companies. Undoubtedly she could go back to congress without opposition, but she says she wants to devote more time to her private activities.

STILL refusing to appropriate $12,000,000 for the Florida ship canal, the senate passed the army bill carrying approximately $611,000,000. More than half the sum goes for the military activities of the War department.

There will be no reduction in the number of CCC camps during most of the coming fiscal year, and the enrollees will be kept up to about the 350,000 mark. This was the decision of President Roosevelt after a threatened revolt of Democratic representatives induced him to change his mind in the matter.

Senator Black, chairman of the senate lobbying committee, has added the Wichita Beacon to the papers whose telegrams he has seized or attempted to seize.

SENATOR WILLIAM E. BORAH is campaigning earnestly for the Republican Presidential nomination, and has just received a big boost for his cause in the announcement that Dr. Francis E. Townsend, founder of the old age pension plan that bears his name, will give the Idahoan all his support. Repudiating President Roosevelt and changing his registration at Long Beach, Calif., from Democratic to Republican, Townsend said Borah was the only Republican candidate who "even approached" the standard of the Townsendites, although the senator has refused to indorse the Townsend pension plan as it stands.

Hitherto the Townsend organization had favored circulation of third party petitions in every state to enlist millions of people as a demonstration of strength. So the doctor's announcement is a reversal of policy.

More Years, More Cares
Monkeys and Yellow Fever
The King Sees Poverty
Ancient Koran Found

The French have a saying, referring to a man's age, "One year more, one care more"—Un an de plus, un soin de plus.

Arthur Brisbane

European nations might take for their motto, "One treaty more, one more danger of war."

Italy, Austria, Hungary have a three-power treaty under which Italy guarantees Austrian independence against any attempt by Germany to absorb Austria, for instance. There is possible cause for war if any cause were lacking.

Sao Paulo, Brazil, worries about reports brought by health officers from the forests of the upper Sorocabana area. In that region, where mosquitoes are thick, explorers frequently saw "monkeys with high fevers" drop out of trees and die, dozens of them, victims of yellow fever.

Fortunately for Brazil cities, the jungle mosquito that bites monkeys and gives them yellow fever keeps away from cities. The fight against disease-bearing mosquitoes and rats would keep men busy, if they were not busy already killing each other in war.

Edward VIII, new king of England, visited the magnificently luxurious ocean steamer Queen Mary in Glasgow, then went from house to house, knocking on doors, visiting some of the worst slum dwellings in all his kingdom.

Later, talking to Lord Melchett, the king put the problem of England, this country and the whole world in these few words:

"How do you reconcile a world that has produced this mighty ship with the slums we have just visited?"

A marvelously illustrated ancient manuscript of the Koran, found in a shop of an antiquity dealer of Cairo, Egypt, was bought for fifty pounds. Heaven knows how many thousands of pounds it is actually worth.

The Koran is said to have been written by a highly educated Jew, who suggested ideas to Mohammed, the latter being unable to write.

It is possible, however, that angels, supposed to have revealed divine truth to Mohammed, also taught him to write.

Good news for tree growers, fruit trees or others. You may get rid of insect pests by hammering the trunks of trees with a riveting machine, such as is used in driving rivets in city skyscrapers.

A California inventor patented the process. This writer proposes to try it in a New Jersey orchard at the earliest possible moment. The riveting is said to loosen insect pests, after which it is easy to wash them off with a strong spray of water, no chemicals needed. To save the tree from injury, it is probably desirable to put several thicknesses of old automobile tires or tubes between the bark and the riveting machine.

There is plenty of money in this country, billions of it, Jesse Jones will tell you, but it is not circulating, as unhealthy for money in a country as for blood in your veins.

You know the strange, perhaps true, story of a man who unwittingly passed a counterfeit $10 bill. It went through the hands of ten individuals, paid for $100 worth of goods, and came back to the man who originally passed it. He identified and destroyed it.

One hundred dollars' worth of debts had been paid, nobody was any the worse. Money is a queer thing.

Do not give "living toys" to your children for Easter presents. Many parents and friends thoughtlessly give children helpless living creatures, easily hurt—live chicks, or newly hatched ducklings.

The helpless creatures are roughly treated, mutilated, fortunate if they happen to be promptly killed, by children that know no better.

Doctor Townsend promises $200 a month to everybody past sixty. That would cost twenty-four thousand million dollars a year. Congressmen know it can't be done, but do not dare say so individually.

Townsend clubs have organized millions of votes. The $200-a-month promise made that easy. Congressmen do not want those votes cast against them as individuals.

The hard-working, intelligent Swiss nation is said to be disturbed by the prospect of another war as by none other.

Every Swiss under fifty is armed, trained and ready. Even in the big war nobody tried to invade Switzerland—too much hard climbing, and the conqueror would not know how to run the hotels, even if he acquired them.

The immediate business of this country is to find some way of controlling flood waters—probably not impossible.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

FAMOUS WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington.—Five hundred thousand additional workers must be absorbed in private employment to avoid an additional relief appropriation. That is the calculation of experts here who figured on the precise meaning of President Roosevelt's message.

To put it another way, federal relief expenditures are to be cut, under the President's plan, precisely the amount that private employers can save the government relief rolls by hiring people off them. Roosevelt figures on a saving by this method of $400,000,000. This is the amount—on the boondoggling type of project—that taking care of 500,000 workers would cost.

The cost to private employers would be much greater, of course, for private employers pay better wages than are paid on the boondoggling projects. It is fair to compare with boondoggling projects, for the President made it perfectly clear that everything from now on is to be WPA and there is to be no more PWA.

This was quite a blow, incidentally, to Harold L. Ickes. He has been conducting a great propaganda campaign for "worthwhile" projects, showing that the country approved them enormously, as indicated by various referendum ballots taken in various sections on bond issues, etc.

Mr. Ickes had a list of nearly 1,500 projects, estimated to cost $350,000,000, all approved if and when the money should be appropriated. All these are now out the window. They didn't even get as far as Quoddy and the Florida ship canal, which Ickes never did approve.

Would Cut Relief Cost

If business does come through with the employment of an average of 500,000 additional men throughout the year, relief expenditures for the year beginning July 1 will be just $400,000,000 smaller than for the year ending June 30 next. For the present year, according to the best estimates obtainable, relief expenditures will be $3,500,000,000. For the year beginning July 1 they will be, again according to estimates, $3,100,000,000.

Next year's figures are obtained by adding the $1,500,000,000 that the President just asked to $600,000,000 already in the congressional estimates for CCC camps and other public works, and then adding in the $1,000,000,000 that, it is calculated, will be in the federal till on July 1, left over from this year's appropriations.

It is actual spending that counts, not appropriations. Naturally anything looks good compared with that $4,880,000,000 in last year's relief bill. But that billion dollars left over—at least that is what the government actuaries say will be left over—changes the picture materially.

Aside from the cost of relief and its obvious effect on taxes, the most important phase of the President's message was what it may mean to hours of labor in this country. On the very day before the message was read to congress, Senator Black announced he would make no effort to push his 30-hour bill.

The President has no intention of presenting legislation to force this shortening of hours. He alluded regretfully to the NRA codes, but there is no indication they are coming back. Indications are that the President will work for his objective of shorter hours by the labor union route, which is more satisfactory to union labor leaders, but leaves out a lot of unorganized workers.

Make Corporations Pay

There is a strong possibility that President Roosevelt's idea of eliminating present corporation taxes, as part of his new plan to force greater distribution to stockholders of corporation earnings, will be abandoned before congress concludes its labors with the tax bill.

Congress, in a way of speaking, has virtually set its heart on making corporations, and corporation stockholders, pay all the additional money needed by the treasury. It would like nothing better than to forget all about the proposed excise taxes, which were, under the President's original plan, to finance the new farm program.

But it is already realized by those familiar with the treasury revenue tables which have been submitted to the house ways and means committee that this cannot be done if the President's general idea is followed. It certainly cannot be done if all the present corporation taxes are repealed.

The point is that present corporation taxes are yielding slightly under $1,000,000,000 a year to the federal treasury. It is estimated that were they continued they would yield more than $1,000,000,000 for the calendar year 1936, because most corporation earnings promise to be better this year than last.

It is also generally conceded that most corporations would boost their dividend rates—assuming they are now pursuing the policy of putting something into surplus every year—so as to avoid the very high tax levies. There is such a thing as mass pressure, even among corporation stockholders. Treasury figures show the astounding figure of 124,120,930 persons who would draw additional dividends although their incomes are so small that they do not pay income taxes at all! True, the additional amount they would be paid is only a little more than $3 a year each, but it amounts to $383,000,000. Quite a sizable chunk to deduct from corporation taxes. The treasury loses about $60,000,000 right there!

Big Loss to Treasury

The next group number 2,191,302 persons, who would draw $310,000,000 more in dividends. These have incomes from $1,000 to $5,000, thus getting the lowest income tax rate. So that on these dividends the treasury would get 4 per cent—maximum—instead of the 15 per cent they would pay as corporation income taxes, plus the capital stock tax and the excess profits tax.

Also, the earnings thus forced out in dividends would distribute about $370,000,000 a year to institutional investors who would be exempt under any plan that has a Chinaman's chance of going through. Another loss of $60,000,000 from the present system.

All of which, as the ways and means committee members know perfectly well, is without making any allowance whatsoever for increased spending by corporations, which would seek to build up surplus in another form than dollars or additional plant. For example, by advertising.

Some of the biggest surplus accumulators among corporations are those which manufacture and sell to the public articles whose continued sale is dependent upon advertising.

No "Must" List

President Roosevelt has practically no "must" list of legislation for congress, if one excepts the tax bill. True, he is back of the Norris bill, which would lend $50,000,000 a year for two years, and then $40,000,000 a year for eight more, for the development of the rural electric projects. But this has already passed the senate, and it is the senate where the time element is important. The house could arrange to adjourn a week from any Tuesday and not even have to hurry its normal speed.

But there are pending a great many measures which are of enormous importance, especially to business men, manufacturers, shippers, and tax producers generally. Interest in them for the last ten days has been almost entirely submerged by the greater importance of the tax bill, the one "must" measure. But there they are, and some of them will probably pass.

For instance, there is the Patman-Robinson bill. It aims at preventing manufacturers from giving big customers what the Federal Trade commission regards as an unfairly large discount. The two shining targets, of course, are the chain stores and the mail order houses.

Maybe this measure will be so emasculated that it won't mean anything. Maybe in final form it will be so drastic that it will really do what its backers hope for. Consider the possibilities of the latter. One is that the big chains and mail order houses would just go in for manufacturing in a big way, probably buying out the present independent manufacturers who are selling to them more cheaply than they sell to the "little fellows" who are the competitors of the chains and mail order houses. Either that or the manufacturer whose chief business comes through orders from the chains or mail order houses simply decides to throw in his lot with the big ones altogether. The law can prevent discriminations, but it cannot force a manufacturer to sell when he doesn't want to do so.

Walsh-Healey Bill

Consider the Walsh-Healey bill. They are really two bills. But they aim at forcing contractors getting government money to comply with the old NRA codes.

In view of the fact that the government is spending such a prodigious amount these days—in fact a very sizable percentage of all the money spent, especially in the heavy industries—here is a law that is of vital interest, to put it mildly, to a lot of business men. The odds against its passage should be about three to two, but there is no telling.

Important to all railroads and truckers, and stockholders in either, is the Pettengill bill. This would permit the railroads to forget all about previous rules on long and short hauls. It would virtually permit the railroads to make rates so as to get the business, or any particular bit of it, without revising all their rates and throwing their rate structure haywire.

When I told her what I had learned, which, except that my cousin was safe, was little enough—

"We must make for Yorick," she said. "Pharaoh's stranded, and that will give me a chance—with my brother, I mean. If Valentine's bored enough, I may be able to get him to go away. If I offer him the Carlotta, he may see the point of a month at Juan-les-Pins. Besides, if we want your cousin, Yorick is where he will be. He's certain to be watching the castle—it's all he can do. He probably visits Plumage, as you did today. But he knows that when we return, it will be to Yorick itself."

"Very good," said I. "I take it we drive to the door."

"Oh, yes. It's safe enough now."

"You think you'll get Valentine off by an early train?"

"He keeps late hours. If I let him have the Carlotta, I might get him off tonight. He's a creature of impulse, you know. Paint the toy bright enough, and he'll want it at once. My God, John, I've got to do it. He simply must be gone before Pharaoh comes back."

At length—

"Why not go to Pommers?" I said. "And use your original plan? We've only to find my cousin, and that should be easy enough. Let Pharaoh go back to Yorick. And then one night we'll cross the moat by the foot-bridge and do him in."

"I'm afraid to wait, my darling. If Pharaoh gets his foot in again, I think he'll play the card in his sleeve. He doesn't want to play it, but after tonight he'll feel that the luck's against him—and out it'll come. And the card that he's got in his sleeve is putting my brother wise." She drew in her breath. "Once Valentine knows of the gold, it's no good killing Pharaoh, for three weeks later another will reign in his stead. My brother will talk right and left. What's almost worse, he'll never leave me alone, as long as there's 20 pounds left. So you see, for that reason alone, Valentine must be gone before Pharaoh comes back."

The miles streamed by in silence, and I think it was just past midnight when I switched the Rolls off the road and into the entrance-drive.

As our headlights illuminated the gateway, I saw that the curtains were gone and the gates were shut, but a wicket in one of the leaves was open wide, and a servant was standing beside it, shading his eyes. He had, of course, seen our lights from the porter's lodge and had opened for 'Captain Faning,' as no doubt he had done before. As I brought the Rolls up to the wicket, I saw him start. Then he opened the door for his mistress and bowed to the ground.

"Come, John," said Helena quietly. She turned to the man. "Shut the wicket, Hubert, and wait in the lodge. The car will stay there."

In a flash she was in the courtyard, with Sabre and me behind.

The doors were open, and Helena sped up the staircase which led to the principal rooms. In the hall the lights were burning, but from first to last I saw no other servants, and we afterwards learned that the Count, at Pharaoh's suggestion, had sent them to bed every evening at half-past ten.

Helena's ear was fast to the library door. After a moment she passed to the dining-room. There for a moment she listened. Then her hand went out to the handle and softly opened the door.

A girl was standing on the table, regarding herself in the huge Italian mirror that hung on the wall. Her dress did not become her—it was so much finer than she. The scene was too coarse to be comic. Some girl from the streets of Lass was trying on Helena's clothes.

Champagne was on the table and on the floor. The Count was lying, flat on his back. His condition was most apparent. To say he was drunk conveys nothing. Valentine, Count of Yorick, was down and out.

The girl had seen us in the mirror. Her hands clapped fast to her cheeks, she was staring at Helena's reflection with starting eyes. To confirm the mirror's report, she shot us one glance of horror; then she crumpled and sank to the table, dragging the dress about her and shrinking as though from some vision which was but waiting to give her the judgment that she deserved.

Helena went to her quickly and touched her arm.

"Don't be afraid," she said quietly. "If you do as I tell you, I'll see that you come to no harm."

She turned to me, to speak English.

"Can you get him on to the terrace and bring him round?"

"I'll try," said I. "But I haven't a lot of hope."

With that, I picked up the Count and carried him out.

But the fellow was too far gone. He would come to his senses in time, but nothing that I could do would hale them back.

As I sat back on my heels—

"No good?" said Helena quietly.

"Hopeless," said I. "He's all in. He may come round by midday, but he won't be fit to talk to for 24 hours."

As the words left my mouth, the castle clock told us the time.

A quarter past twelve.

"We must get him away," said Helena. "Now, at once. There's a train that leaves Lass for Innsbruck at one o'clock. We can't put him aboard at Lass—he's too well known, but I guess the train stops at Gola—that's ten miles on. The girl will have to go with him and see that he comes to no harm."

Although I could see that it was drastic, I had then no idea how monstrous was the action which she proposed. Her brother was her liege lord; when he succeeded her father, she was the first of his vassals to go on her knees, to put her hands between his, to swear to honor his person and ever maintain his freedom and all his rights. And this was no matter of form. For better or worse, for more than five hundred years the body of the Count had been sacred in the eyes of his house.

Times might change, but not Yorick. Its motto held.

On that handsome July night Helena snapped the tradition and broke her oath. Not a servant would have dared help her.

After perhaps five minutes our plans were laid.

Whilst Helena spoke with Mona, the girl from Lass, I scrawled a note to Pharaoh, and boldly signed it "V. Y."

Dear Faning:

Sorry, but I'm fed up. I've had enough of Yorick and I'm going tonight. I don't know where, but I'll probably get a train. See you again some day. . . .

I think it looked the note of a drunken man.

As I laid down my pencil—

"That'll do very well," said Helena. "He never writes, so nobody knows his hand. Leave it there on the blotting-pad. And now we must go. Mona's a broken reed, but it can't be helped. I'm not afraid of her talking—she's far too scared for that. But I am afraid of her bolting the moment she gets the chance."

As the Porter Stepped Out of His Lodge.

A moment later our strange procession took shape.

Helena led the way and I brought up the rear, with the Count on my back, while Mona minced between us, bearing her shoes in her hand.

Six paces away from the gates, I laid my burden down.

"Is your back all right?" breathed Helena.

"Yes, thank you, my sweet."

At once she turned to Mona, who was drooping beside the wall.

"If you cross that bridge, the porter will see you, and you will be chased and caught. In a few minutes' time, however, the porter will leave his lodge. You'll know when he's gone, because then the wicket will open. The moment the wicket opens, cross the bridge. When you're over the bridge, you can put on your shoes. Then run down the drive until you come to the woods. Wait there at the edge of the meadows, and the car will be down in five minutes to pick you up."

"It is understood, my lady."

"You will wait without fail, on the right-hand side of the road."

"Without fail, my lady. My lady will not be long."

"Five minutes," I said. "Perhaps I shall come before. But until the wicket opens, you must not move."

"Very good, my lady."

With many misgivings we left her and hastened the way we had come. This time, however, we left the postern ajar.

We had found her bedroom lighted and left it so—an open wardrobe declared the rape of the frock; and now we only waited to set wide open the doors of the principal rooms. Then we went down to the courtyard—up to the last of the jumps.

As the porter stepped out of his lodge—

"Why didn't you tell me," said Helena, "that his lordship was gone?"

The fellow looked scared.

"I—I didn't know, my lady. I—I thought his lordship was here."

"He went this evening. He says so. He's left a note."

The porter put a hand to his head.

"No one has gone out, my lady, since half-past nine. And at half-past nine, my lady, I know that his lordship was here."

There was a startled silence. Then—

"Fetch the night-watchman," said Helena.

The man ran into the courtyard and disappeared.

In a flash the wicket was open and I was outside.

As I heaved him into the car, I saw a bedraggled figure hurrying on to the bridge. I laid the Count flat on the floor-boards and put his coat over his face. Then I took my seat at the wheel and started to turn the car round. . . .

Helena was speaking.

"Rouse the other watchmen and the warden as well. The castle is to be searched. Unless he left by a postern, his lordship must still be here. Tell the warden that I have news for his lordship which will not wait, that I've gone to Lass to catch him in case he has gone."

"Your ladyship will be returning?"

"Within the hour."

I had the car well in the shadows and Helena's door was open before she left the wicket to take her seat. And she was so quick that, though the porter made to escort her, I was able to have the car moving before he was out of the light.

As I whipped over the drawbridge, I heard her sigh with relief.

"And now for Mona," she said.

The time was now half past twelve, which shows that much may be done in a quarter of an hour. Indeed, I would not have believed it if the clock had not been chiming as we passed over the bridge.

As we left the meadows, I set a foot on the brake and switched out my lights.

For a moment we sat in silence. Then—

"Mona," cried Helena. "Mona."

The girl did not answer, and after a frantic moment I flung myself out of the car.

"Mona," I cried, "where are you?"

A figure rose out of the night.

"She's hopped it, sir," said Barley. "Cut through the woods. But I'm thankful to see you, sir. And that's the truth."

It was twenty minutes later, on the skirts of Annabel village, that Barley stood by the Rolls and told us his tale.

We dared not return to the castle before ten minutes past one, for Lass was 12 miles from Yorick and not even the Rolls could have done the double journey in less than 35 minutes, no matter how much she was pushed. We had, therefore, ten minutes to spare—much against our will, for that Pharaoh was racing for Yorick we had not a shadow of doubt. Still, to be uneasy was foolish; that day I had done the journey as Pharaoh was doing it now. If Pharaoh had the luck of the devil, we might expect to see him at half-past one; but I would have laid a fortune that he would not arrive before six.

So, as we had time to spare, Barley stood by the Rolls and told us his tale.

"A wire come on Monday, sir, a little later than usual, about ten o'clock. 'Return at once,' it said and it bore your name. Well, we left as sharp as we could—for Villach, of course; but when we gets out at Villach, there ain't no car to meet us, let alone no Rolls. 'That's queer,' says Mr. Bohun. 'I don't understand it,' he says. 'If Mr. Spencer could wire, he could send a car. It may be all right, but we'd better go careful, Barley, from this time on.' Well, we 'ired a car at Villach, and stopped four miles from the farm. Then we enters the woods on foot. It was just about half-past four when we sights the house. Everything looks as usual—sleepy an' peaceful, you know, sir, an' no one about. But Mr. Bohun's uneasy. 'Mustn't rush in,' he says. 'You stay an' watch out,' he says, 'while I go round to the back.' He hadn't hardly spoken before Rush comes out on the apron, as bold as brass.

"I give you my word, sir, that shook us. We made sure they'd got you all right. But of course we couldn't do nothing until it was dark. Then we crept in and 'ad a close-up." He drew in his breath. "Those two—Rush and Bugle—they're simple, that's what they are. They're like a turn on the 'alls. You could walk right in between them, before they'd know you were there. For 'alf an hour that evening we listened to what they said, and of course we very soon knew that Pharaoh'd got his foot in the castle and you was away. Then Mr. Bohun goes for the farmer's wife, but she knows nothing at all, except that his lordship's back and given special orders that Bugle and Rush is to have your rooms at the farm.

"Well, we had to have quarters somewhere, so Mr. Bohun comes here. 'The last place they'll look,' he says, 'and the best I know.' Then we starts in watchin' the castle and visitin' Plumage at night. And that was all we could do, for to look for you was hopeless—we didn't know where to begin. But we knew where Pharaoh was, and we made up our minds to get him, for once he was out of the way, all roads were clear."

Barley closed his eyes and pushed back his hat.

Blackbird Composer

Man's power of creating music is challenged, declares Prof. Eduard Engel, of Potsdam, by only one other living creature in the world—the blackbird. This bold assertion may arouse those who believe the canary or nightingale to be supreme amongst bird musicians. But, whereas these birds pour forth their hereditary songs without blemish, the blackbird, the professor affirms, creates music of its own, improvising "strophes" on the spot. A tireless inventor of new harmony, the bird also has the true, artist's hatred of repetition. When inspired, it sings from 300 to 500 different melodies in a single day.—Tit-Bits Magazine.

Childbirth's Pains Safely Banned by Savants' Discovery

New Chemical Formula Puts Mother to Sleep

WASHINGTON.—A safe way of taking the suffering out of childbirth has long been a goal of medical scientists as well as the prayer of countless mothers the world over. One by one, various anesthetics and pain-killing agents have been tried—chloroform, ether, nitrous oxide or "laughing gas," twilight sleep, to name a few familiar ones.

Some have been rejected because of danger to mother and child. Others were of limited use because complicated apparatus and skilled anesthetists were needed to give them. Others have brought only partial relief of suffering, or have relieved the pain in some cases and not in others.

Years of Research.

The long quest seems now to have been ended by a discovery of two Washington, D. C., physicians, Drs. Howard F. Kane and George B. Roth of George Washington University Medical school. After years of careful research they have hit on what may prove to be the ideal childbirth anesthetic.

The agent they use is a mixture of paraldehyde and benzyl alcohol. The mixture is injected when the first labor pains are reported and the patient falls asleep within half an hour or an hour. She sleeps soundly and awakens actually refreshed some six or eight hours after delivery.

Is Easily Administered.

The chief advantage of the new method, Doctor Kane said, is that there is no danger to either mother or child. Another advantage is the fact that the anesthetic can be easily given and requires no complicated apparatus. It has been tried in several hundred cases during the last three and a half years at the George Washington University hospital, and no ill effects have been noticed in either mother or child.

Gold Output Value Exceeds Billion for First Time

NEW YORK.—Gold mining, among the oldest industries of man, entered the billion dollar business stage for the first time in 1935, the meeting here of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers learned.

"Preliminary estimates for 1935," declared John J. Croston, Boston mining engineer, "indicate that more than 30,000,000 ounces of gold were produced, 10 per cent more than the 1934 record.

"Ranking in order as gold producers were the Union of South Africa, Russia, the United States and Canada, with Russia showing the greatest percentage of increase. In view of the large number of new mines being prepared for production in Canada, Australia, the Gold Coast and the United States, further increases in production are expected in 1936 and 1937."

Depression Boomed Mines.

The start of the depression in 1929, Mr. Croston pointed out, marked the turning point for gold mining from a declining to an increased industry. Up till 1929 there was a gradual depletion of known gold deposits and the operating costs increased while the price of gold was pegged—as it had been since 1717—at $20.67 an ounce.

Following 1929 the first aid to the industry was the decline of wages and supplies which, enabled some marginal operators to get a foothold.

Biggest spur, of course, was when Great Britain and finally the United States went off the gold standard.

Lipstick Scent Causes Occasional Skin Trouble

CHICAGO.—Change the scent of your lipstick, girls, if the kind you are using brings on a skin trouble.

The doctors have traced some cases of lipstick dermatitis—the skin disorder that occasionally develops among users of a lip rouge—to the perfume it contains.

A particular offender is a perfume containing methyl heptine carbonate. The Journal of the American Medical Association states.

A young woman came to her doctor with a breaking out on the skin, which he traced to her use of lipstick. She had been using a certain brand for years with no ill effects until she changed shades.

By patch tests on the girl's arm, the physician found that she was sensitive not to the oil or dyes in the rouge but only to the perfume used in two shades of lipstick she had been using.

No Need to Suffer "Morning Sickness"

"Morning sickness"—is caused by an acid condition. To avoid it, acid must be offset by alkalis—such as magnesia.

Why Physicians Recommend Milnesia Wafers

These mint-flavored, candy-like wafers are pure milk of magnesia in solid form—the most pleasant way to take it. Each wafer is approximately equal to a full adult dose of liquid milk of magnesia. Chewed thoroughly, then swallowed, they correct acidity in the mouth and throughout the digestive system and insure quick, complete elimination of the waste matters that cause gas, headaches, bloated feelings and a dozen other discomforts.

Fabric Accent on Pretty Woolens

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

SUIT yourself this spring—it's quite the smartest thing to do. To state it more emphatically, a suit or "compose" ensemble tailored of handsome woolen weave is a fashion "must" this spring. You are not the type to wear a suit? Before you jump at conclusions see the endless variety of suits in the spring style parade. There is no question as to finding an affinity suit this season.

There's a whole family-tree of suits in the fashion picture, related as far as the perfectly stunning woolens that fashion them, yet entirely different in the final analysis of color moods, silhouette and general style. If you are too heavy at the waistline to wear one of the trim little man-tailored short-jacket suits, there is a consolation prize awaiting you in the picturesque cape-and-skirt models tailored of some one or other of the gorgeous tropical woolens that make color glory and novel weave their theme. Such a costume is pictured to the left in the illustration. This is a Bruyere ensemble of a nubby gray and green mixed summer tweed. This type is a decided favorite with smart Parisiennes.

The classic tailleur developed in men's wear suitings is an outstanding fashion, with definite preference for the single breasted type with its flattering sweep of long lapels. Both hard and soft finished worsteds are used in these suits, with sharkskins, herringbone weaves, distinct checks, cheviots, serge types, monotone and chalk stripe flannels and wool gabardine all important.

Men's checked worsted is the practical fabric for the good looking spring suit to the right in the picture. It has a classic single-breasted three-button jacket with traditional flap pockets and a slim straight skirt. The back panel of the jacket and the skirt are correspondingly slashed at the sides.

The new mixed or compose ensembles are appearing with coats in contrasting color and fabric. The "baby reefer" of fingertip length with double-breasted closing and man-tailored styling of lapels and pockets is frequently seen in covert cloth, or in wool gabardine, in beige, tan, navy or gray worn over tailored suits or with the one-piece dress of contrasting woolen. A reefer coat of the sort described centers the group shown. It is tailored of a very fine wool gabardine. Note especially its new length. The latest "baby" swagger coats also adopt this new length, also a hiplength.

The newest tweeds (in the lead for travel and country wear) are in rich deep colorings accented with flecks and nubs of contrasting shades. There are also many soft lovely tweeds in natural and pastel colors with over-patternings in bright color. Casual assemblings are smart in informal suits, the skirts frequently being in monotone or flecked tweeds and the jackets in gun club patternings, hound's tooth or shepherd checks or conservative glen plaids.

A leading fashion is the adaptation of the masculine morning suit with striped skirt and oxford gray jacket in men's wear worsted, frequently bound with braid. Another favorite in this class is developed in men's wear flannel with pearl gray skirt and steel gray jacket with revers of the lighter skirt fabric.

TRICKY GLOVES

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

As front page news novel fabric gloves are "it" in a big way this season. Not only are gloves creating a sensation because of their startling colors but they are given to tricks that are as practical as they are intriguing. A really wonderful idea is the glove with a zipper pocket in the left wrist to hold your small change. See it in action as pictured above. Another cute idea is the glove with an unbreakable crystal inset on left wrist (see picture) so that your wrist watch is visible without turning back the cuff. This year there is an endless variety of beautiful mesh glove fabrics of bemberg brought out.

Knife-Pleated Sleeves

Some of the new sleeves now shown are knife-pleated.

SPRING HATS REVEL IN TOASTED TONES

In addition to black and plenty of navy blue—especially a dark purplish shade—the prominent colors in hats for spring and early summer are toasted tones, blond tortoise shell, burnt straw, natural beige, fawn, tomato red and soft tints of washed blue, as well as tones of grayish blues on the slate side.

Bright red is used a great deal in combination with black, with navy blue and with white. The greens are represented by soft tones of reseda.

Pastel tones in general are foreseen for spring and summer, and among them is a soft shade of pale faded pink that is sponsored by all the leading milliners. This color is called old pink by certain houses and ashes of roses by other designers.

Sequin Embroideries Far From Being Exhausted

The vogue of sequin embroideries is far from being exhausted.

Such houses as Maggy Rouff and Chanel use sequins in wide designs on sheer rayon crepe grounds or on chiffon or lace dresses. Ardanse embroiders with sequins in plastic material the two ends of a long scarf or panel in the same fabric as the evening dress, and fastens this scarf to the wrist where the embroidery gives a bracelet effect. Lelong obtains changeable effects on chiffon dresses by disposing sequins in degrade tones.

Spanish Shawl Scarfs

Spanish shawl scarfs are being shown with some of the new spring hats. They are made of knitted black silk edged with fringe and are worn knotted loosely about the neck like a fichu.

Shoe Colors

Newest shades for women's footwear in London include wine rose, burgundy, berry bloom, cassowary and raspberry.

For a Change

You can vary a simple shirtwaist frock of white or pastel silk by a change of color every day or so in silk necktie and scarf sash to match.

Punch and Judy Shows Solve Kids' Behavior Problems

"Problem Child" Analyzed by Puppet Dramas

CLEVELAND. — Punch and Judy and other puppet show characters beloved of children are helping psychiatrists untangle serious behavior difficulties and ward off mental and personality disorders. Details of this new use for puppet shows were given by Dr. Lauretta Bender and Adolph Woltmann of Bellevue hospital, New York city, at a meeting of the American Orthopsychiatric association.

The method has met with striking success, the New York psychiatrists said. It was developed in the children's observation ward of the hospital where hundreds of children suffering from all kinds of behavior problems are sent in each year from children's courts, mental hygiene clinics, schools and other institutions.

The greatest need among this group of children is, first, an adequate understanding of their emotional problems and, second, a form of treatment that will deal with the emotional problems involved. Because of the small staff, it is impossible to give individual attention to each group of children. The puppet shows, however, can be used to detect the difficulties of the children in a group and also to help the children work out the solution of their problems.

How the Plots Develop.

The shows are written and produced to deal directly with such problems of children as rivalry between brothers and sisters, the unloved child, aggression, and over-devotion to one or the other parent. The hero, Caspar, can in the shows face all kinds of problems and the children in the audience can help him decide what to do.

The children are also taught to make the puppets and write and produce their own plays. In the course of these classes, the children discuss freely the various problems in the impersonal terms of the puppets. The puppets have in this way helped the psychiatrists enormously in gaining insight into the various complexes of the children.

Electric "Prospector" Finds Coal Veins in Pennsylvania

NEW YORK.—The same technique of using electrical prospecting methods—often likened to electrical divining rods—which has worked so successfully in discovering oil, gold and other minerals, is now being used to find deposits of coal in Pennsylvania.

Scientists told the meeting of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers here that the new electrical methods, based on how well a seam of coal conducts electricity, were successful in the Mahanoy coal fields which already have been worked for 70 years.

Locating Anthracite Pits.

Most of the coal seams, Dr. Maurice Ewing, A. P. Crary, J. W. Peoples and J. A. Peoples, Jr., describe in their report, were worked near the surface in the past but since the workings were never completely or accurately mapped complete extraction of the coal from older pits was not obtained. In consequence, they point out, virgin bodies of coal, not heretofore known, are yet to be found.

The electrical prospecting consists of passing a known electric current between metal stakes driven into the ground at considerable distance apart. How much current will flow between the stakes depends on how well the underlying minerals conduct the current.

Now It's All Right to Mow Your Dandelions

ANN ARBOR, MICH.—Dandelions have almost ceased from troubling lawn-anxious householders; but Prof. Carl D. LaRue of the University of Michigan is offering, for future reference, the results of his study of seed behavior in the heads of dandelions mowed before the seeds were ripe.

He undertoook his investigation because he had received many inquiries whether dandelion heads cut down by the lawnmower would go on and ripen seeds that would sprout later. He cut off a large number of the heads at various stages of development and let them lie on moist moss until they had fully dried. Then he examined and placed the seeds under conditions for germination.

He found that in all heads cut at any stage before the white down ("pappus" to botanists) began to show above the closed green sheath after the petals had wilted, the seeds looked quite unpromising and that their germination performance did not belie their looks. They all failed to sprout; in fact, after ten days they had all decayed.

Professor LaRue concludes: "Apparently then, until the white of the dandelion pappus begins to extend beyond the green involucre tips, the heads may be cut and allowed to dry on the lawn without any danger of spreading the seed."

Lesson for April 5

JESUS INVITES ALL PEOPLE

LESSON TEXT—Luke 14:15-24.

GOLDEN TEXT—Come; for all things are now ready.—Luke 14:17.

PRIMARY TOPIC—How Jesus Kept the Sabbath.

JUNIOR TOPIC—A Great Invitation.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Excuses We Make.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Our Response to Christ's Invitation.

In this chapter Luke pictures Jesus freely mingling with his fellowmen in worship and social intercourse. While thus freely mingling with his fellowmen, he was aware of their inner hostility to him and set forth under the parable of the great supper the sinful folly of men who reject his gracious offer of salvation.

I. The Great Supper (v. 16).

This great supper represents God's gracious provision of salvation through the vicarious atonement of Jesus Christ. Christ himself declared that he was the bread of life. As bread is to the physical body, so is Jesus Christ to the soul. It is called a supper because it is the last meal of the day. Jesus Christ's sacrificial death is God's last effort for the salvation of men. The one who misses supper goes hungry through the night; the one who neglects and rejects the gracious offer of salvation in Jesus Christ shall forever perish. It is a great supper because its provision was made in the counsels of the eternal Godhead. It was wrought out by the Son of God and avails for the salvation of all races and kindred and tongues. There is no one whose sinful condition debars him from this precious feast.

II. The Gracious and Urgent Invitation (vv. 16, 17).

These words, "Come; for all things are now ready," reveal the attitude of God toward a sinning race. Truly it is not the will of God that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. His servants have been going up and down the world for thousands of years saying to men dead in trespasses and sins, perishing for want of the bread of life, "Come; for all things are now ready." God is never behind time. There is absolutely nothing lacking in his provision for needy souls. The only thing demanded of the hungry and dying world is that it accept his urgent invitation. Man's responsibility is to receive Jesus Christ. All who accept his invitation are assured of a welcome at his table.

III. Men's Attitude Toward God's Gracious Invitation (vv. 18-20).

"They all with one accord began to make excuse." They feigned a willingness to come, but their excuses showed that they were completely absorbed in selfish interests and, therefore, disregarded the invitation of the divine Host. This is a vivid picture of the reception which men are everywhere giving the gospel.

1. The first one was taken up with the buying of land. On this account he begged to be excused. Supper time is a poor time to go to see a piece of ground. Besides, he had already bought the ground and, therefore, he was under no necessity of going to see it at supper time.

2. The second man desired to be excused in order that he might test a yoke of oxen which he had bought. Supper time is not a proper time to test oxen. Then, too, he had already bought them; therefore, there was no urgency in testing them.

3. The third excuse was perhaps the flimsiest of all. In all probability his wife would have been glad to accompany him. It is to be noted that the excuses made are plausible, as they concern things that are right in themselves. It is right for a man to have land, have oxen, and live with a wife, but when these legitimate interests crowd out God and the things of the Spirit, they are to be ignored.

IV. Guests From the Highways and Hedges (vv. 21-24).

1. The anger of the master of the house (v. 21). It should not be forgotten that God, while great in mercy, is capable of anger toward those who reject his mercy. It is a great mistake to remove anger from the character of God. To reject his mercy exposes to his fierce anger.

2. The Lord's house filled (vv. 21-23). The places of the very ones who were first bidden were filled with other guests, some of them poor and helpless, from the lanes and streets of the city and others the vagrants from the highways.

3. The awful condition of those first bidden (v. 24). The master of the house declares that none of them shall taste of his supper. Since the supper represents the free grace and mercy of Jesus Christ, to refuse him is to be eternally deprived of the high privilege of sitting at the Master's table.

Why We Are Lonely

Loneliness is often our own fault. We have not brought others enough into our own life, or we have repelled others by making too many claims upon them, or by seeking too much sympathy for ourselves.—Stopford A. Brooke.

Goodness

As the presence of salt is not so noticeable as its absence, so the good are most appreciated when they are gone.

Distinctive Dress With Scalloped Collar for the Charming Little Girl

1833-B

Any little girl from two to six will look simply charming in this distinctive tiny frock which has a high waist finished off with a dainty scalloped collar, and three little buttons.

The shape of the collar gives the dress a fetchingly demure look that is adorable on all little girls. Notice the soft flare of the skirt and the loose short sleeves—simplicity is the keynote. This design requires a minimum of time and effort to make. Try it in gingham, wool challis, muslin or a silk with a wee little flower design. You can also make this version in a simple crepe which is used in party frocks.

Barbara Bell Pattern No. 1833-B is available for sizes: 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 years. Size 4 requires 1⅝ yards of 35-inch fabric, plus ⅛ yard of contrasting.

The Barbara Bell Pattern Book featuring Spring designs is ready. Send fifteen cents today for your copy.

AFTER ALL, WHAT DOES THE TERM PROPERTY MEAN?

Property is a house with a few feet of ground around it, minus the mortgage and the difference between what you paid for it before 1929 and what you could get for it today. It is a motor car with a dubious trade-in value and household goods with great sentimental value but which would not bring much at a forced sale.

It is a very valuable stamp collection if you could find exactly the right person to buy it. It is a number of books which you imagined were first editions but that, somehow, just miss out. It is a portrait that family tradition has always held to be the work of an old master but that leaves the art experts unmoved. It is a Chinese vase that may go back to the Ming dynasty if you could only make out what the Chinese characters on the bottom mean.

It is children that, according to law, will belong to you only a few years more, but who, in the meantime, are rather expensive to maintain in that manner of living to which they somehow seem to imagine they are entitled. It is accident insurance policies on which you can realize respectable sums by the simple process of losing an eye or an arm or a leg. It is sickness insurance policies that you can cash in upon by becoming an invalid, and life insurance policies that will become worthwhile in the event of your death.

It is, ostensibly, your soil. But, in view of all the considerations mentioned above, there is some doubt as to whether you can really call that your own.—Christopher Billopp in the Baltimore Evening Sun.

Relics of Lost Hittites Found; Indicate Culture

What is believed to be the first step toward the discovery of the lost Hittites, who appear in the Bible as a great imperial power, has been found in Asia Minor. In a 4,000-year-old tomb was discovered a Hittite statue of a bull, seven inches high and inlaid with gold. The silversmith's art is astonishingly modern, and indicates that the race was cultured rather than primitive as previously believed.

The discovery has aroused great interest among European archeologists because previously nothing had been known of the Hittites' work except rock carving and a few potsherds.

More Enterprising Than Inconsolable, We'd Say

The following inscription was lifted from a tombstone in a Paris cemetery:

Here lies Pierre Victor Fournier, inventor of the Everlasting Lamp, which consumes only one centime's worth of oil in one hour. His inconsolable widow continues his business in the Rue aux Trois. Goods sent to all parts of the city. Do not mistake the opposite shop for this.

Which proves that the bereaved sometimes give their minds over to other things than just their sorrow.

Cardui Helps When Nerves Seem "On Edge" Every Month

Women who find themselves in a painful, nervous fix, suffering every month, may have some functional trouble which Cardui should benefit. "At times, I felt like I must scream if a door slammed or there was an unusual noise," writes Mrs. P. A. Odum, of Haines City, Fla. "I did not feel like doing my housework, and as I had other work besides, I felt more like lying down. A friend of mine asked me to try Cardui, which I did. After my first bottle, I felt much better. I continued taking it until I had taken six or seven bottles. By this time I was so much improved I was able to leave it off."

If not benefited by Cardui, consult a physician.

FOR CONGRESS

Tom Maxwell of Tuscaloosa County, Alabama, is a candidate for Congress to represent Alabama's 6th District composed of the Counties: Bibb, Chilton, Greene, Hale, Perry Shelby, Sumter and Tuscaloosa. He asks for support by the ladies and gentlemen Democrats who have gray in their hair those also who will cast their first ballots on May 5th, 1936, and those of all ages in between the other two classes. His platform includes the idea that the Farmer should earn more for his produce than the cost of production in order that he might spend and thus aid all other businesses and adequate pensions for the aged.

CCC Boys Helping To Control Erosion

About two thousand enrollees in 11 CCC Camps assigned to the Soil Conservation Service are working in cooperation with farmers and extension workers to control erosion on thusands f acres f Alabama land.

Before work is started farms are surveyed by a technician of the camp The type of soil, degree of slope, and extent of erosion are determined. With this information in hand the farmer and a soil conservationist go over the farm and assign each field to a particular use that will best control erosion and give the owner the greatest return in crops.

Farmers terrace cultivated land where terraces are needed. The camps contsruct terrace outlets and terrace outlet channels to conduct water from terraces to stabilized areas, to prevent the formation of gullies. Cropping systems including rotations and the fullest possible use of winter and summer legumes are planned to assist in controlling sheet erosion.

Steep, highly erosible areas are re tired from cultivation and planted with such erosion-preventing crops as trees, grass, and kudzu. Gullies are being stabilized with simple check dams and soil-holding vegetation.

One of the purposes of this work is to give farmers throughout the state an opportunity to see what they can do to control erosion on their farms. Visit one or more of the camp work areas this spring or summer to see how erosion control methods are applied by the enrollees and farmers working together.

COMMUNITY WORK PROGRESSING SAYS MISS HODO, LEADER

There seems to be some curiosicy on the part of the general public as to just what the Community Worker does. This item is an attempt to answer this question. The Community Worker, who is associated with the Department of Public Welfare, works with Community groups—Parent-Teacher Associations, American Legion Posts, Girl and Boy Scout Troops, Men's Clubs, Women's Clubs School Organizations and Church Organizations, in an effort to interest the above-mentioned groups in community betterment in general and community recreation in particular.

Miss Margaret Hodo, who is the Community Worker in Shelby County, has visited Columbiana, Calera, Siluria, Maylene, Straven, and Montevallo. In each town she has talked with interested individuals and community groups, and in Straven and Maylene definite plans have been made for a Boy Scout Troop and for a Mother's Social Club. The Community Worker has no money for recreational equipment or leadership but her services are available to any organization which would like help in planning a recreational or community project which they as a group might undertake.

NEW FARM PROGRAM

A. A. Lauderdale, County Agent

To aid you in planning and planting your crop this year and still be able to take part in the Soil Conservation Program, I am going to give you a few of the main principles.

Cotton is about the only crop in Shelby County that will come in for payment for diverting acres to soil conserving or soil biulding crops.

In most cases, if cotton is not increased over last year, you will be in line for this paymemnt. You can get payment for 35% or less of your base cotton acreage; in other words, you are to decide how much you want to leave out up to 35%. To get the payment fo rleaving out cotton, it will also be necessary to plant 20% or 1-5 as many acres in soil building crops. Legume hays are soil conserving crops. Cowpeas, soy beans, and velvet beans interplanted with corn will count 50% soil conserving crops; that is, to have 10 acres of soil conserving crops, it is necessary t oplant 20 acres in corn and cowpeas, soybeans, or velvet beans.

If you turn under 10 acres of good vetch or Austrian peas this spring, it will entitle you to $20 payment, if you have 20 acres of soil conserving crops this year. This will be explain ed in detail later.

As a general rule, I would advise planting as many acres of legumes as possible on your farm, for this will help in getting the payment for leaving out cotton, terracing land, and turning vetch and Austrian peas

Malady Baffling To Health Officials

Outstanding public health agencies and authorities of the United States have combined their forces and talents in efforts to bring under control an epidemic of a mysterious form of dysentery in the Chattahoochee Valley section of Eastern Alabama and Western Georgia.

The epidemic first became noticeable about a year ago; and since that time the Alabama and Georgia Public Health Departments and the United States Public Health Service with the co-operation of leading scientists, have been working to determine the origin of this baffling malady and, if possible, to find a cure for it.

The results of the investigations thus far conducted were carefully studied and gone over at a recent joint meeting at West Point, Georgia, attended by Dr. James G. Alpine, director of laboratories of the Alabama State Health Department; Dr. D. G. Gill, director of the bureau of preventable diseases; Dr. Justin Andrews, of the Department of Protozoology of the John Hopkins University; and Dr. A. V. Hardie, of the United States Public Health Service and technicians from the Georgia Health Department.

"It is too early at this time to determine the full results of our studies," said Dr. McAlpine, "but we have made some progress. The disease is a mild form of dysentery or colitis, and no fatalities have been reported. An interesting observation made thus far from our studies is that the colored race seems to enjoy an immunity to this disease, as no cases have been found among the negro race. We have determined definitely that it is not amoebic dysentery, and all tests to determine whether it is bacillary in origin have been negative. The exact origin and cause, however, we have yet to learn, and we are still trying to shed more light as to its real nature"

The lower the gas is turned, the brighter it seems to lovers.

MAN WHO RAN HIS FARM FROM WHEEL CHAIR DIES

W. M. Durden, Of Shelby County, Made Success in Life Although Lightning Left Him A Cripple; Bossed Workers Without Seeing Their Efforts

LONGVIEW—The story of the ordiliness and prosperity of the Durden farm here during the past three decades was recalled to day after the death of W. M. Durlen, invalid owner of the property.

Mr. Durden, who was 79, died Friday, from a stroke of paralysis For a quarter of a century he was unable to venture out of his home because of effects of a bolt of lightning which struck him 30 years ago.

Yet his Shelby County farm was considered one of the most modern in the district, for equipment, methods anl results.

For five years after lightning paralyzed his body from his hips down, Mr. Durden had his helpers put him into abuggy from which he supervised his farm. A breaddown forced him to drop his active duties, but he continued to give orders.

In his wheel chair, he would study the latest agricultural methods and put them into practice on his farm.

Although he could not see the men at work, he gave orders for their discahrge or the employment of new men unhesitantly.

Mr. Durden's wife died last April 12. He is survived by one son, Wilson Durden, Longview.

Walton, of Columbiana, directed funeral services.

Treatment For Bumble-Foot Given

Bumble-foot in poultry may be prevented by proper diet, by lowering perches and nests, and by keeping the poultry house floor covered with good litter.

The condition consists of an infection and swelling of the underpart of foot which practically incapacitates the fowl. Bumble-foot, most common in heavy breeds, results from bruises or other injuries to the pad which birds jump from high perches or nests on to hard, unlittered floors. Too much protein and a deficiency of green feed also are conductive to its development.

Treatment consists in cutting open the swelling with a knife, removing the thick pus, and cleansing with suitable disinfectant solution.

Hitler's Peace Proposals Scouted by France—Big Italian Victory May End Ethiopian War—Lowden for Republican Key-Noter.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

ADOLF HITLER'S proposals for peace in Europe, together with his flat rejection of the plan of the other four Locarno powers for settlement of the Rhineland situation, were handed to British Foreign Minister Eden by Joachim von Ribbentrop, and passed on by Eden to the French and Belgian ambassadors in London. The British cabinet thought the German scheme worthy of consideration, but the French government looked upon it as a "cunning plan" to split the Locarno powers and make Hitler the virtual dictator of Europe. Premier Sarraut and Foreign Minister Flandin were consulting on steps for frustrating the reichsfuehrer and preserving a united front of the Locarno nations.

Adolf Hitler

Hitler's note made these proposals:

1. A "standstill" agreement to exist on both sides of the German border for four months during which Germany, France, and Belgium would make no troop movements. This "armistice" would be guaranteed by a neutral commission.

2. A 25-year nonaggression pact between Germany, France, and Belgium, guaranteed by an international arbitration court, to be negotiated immediately after the French elections.

3. Negotiation for nonaggression pacts between Germany and her other neighbors.

4. Germany to return to the League of Nations as an equal if the league covenant is separated from the Versailles treaty and with the understanding that colonial concessions will be made.

5. When a general settlement is in sight conferences to be held to secure the prohibition in warfare of gas, poison and incendiary bombs, bombing of civilians, bombing of towns more than 12 miles from the battle zone, and the abolition of heavy tanks and heavy artillery.

6. A general economic and disarmament conference.

FOLLOWING the example of Germany, the Austrian diet has repudiated that nation's military obligations under the St. Germain treaty. By unanimous vote it approved a bill introduced by Chancellor Kurt von Schuschnigg, providing for general national military service "with or without arms." Every male from his eighteenth to his forty-second year is liable to conscription. This move, which has the support of Premier Mussolini of Italy, was not unexpected, and though it aroused the little entente nations to anger, probably their formal protests will bring no result.

The new law is not likely to bring any great change at present in Austrian armaments, for Austria already had disregarded both the treaty of St. Germain's disarmament provision and its restriction of armaments without serious objection from other countries. Tanks, forbidden to Austria under the treaty, were actually paraded around the Ringstrasse some months ago under the eyes of foreign military attaches whom she had invited.

Hungary may now be expected to violate the treaties and rearm, that, too, being a part of Mussolini's policy.

PEACE negotiations between Italy and Ethiopia, outside the League of Nations, seem imminent, for emissaries of Emperor Haile Selassie already have been received by Marshal Pietro Badoglio, and the Italian undersecretary of colonies is in east Africa to conduct the preliminaries. This news followed closely the dispatches telling of a great victory won by Badoglio's northern troops over 20,000 fresh and picked Ethiopian soldiers whose fight was directed and watched by the emperor himself. The battle, at Mai Ceu, lasted all day and the Ethiopians left 7,000 dead on the field as they fled to join the main body of 50,000 troops south of Lake Ashangi eight miles away. Italian fatalities included 16 officers and about 1,000 soldiers, most of the latter being Eritrean Askaris. It was believed Marshal Badoglio would follow up this victory with a smashing blow at Dessye, main concentration point of the Ethiopians, unless peace negotiations stop him.

Marshal Badoglio

Just before this battle the Italian air bombers attacked and practically ruined Harar, second city of Ethiopia. Most of the populace had fled when scouting planes gave a warning of what was to come, so the casualties were few.

GERMANY'S men and women to the number of 44,389,140 declared by their votes in the reichstag elections that they supported the policies of Hitler. Only 542,898 had the nerve to vote against the reichsfuehrer, and a still smaller fraction refused to go to the polls.

Hitler's victory was thus extraordinarily complete, and the Nazis celebrated it with wild rejoicings in Berlin and other cities. It was the culmination of a three years' campaign in which the leaders sought to persuade the population of the reich that only Hitler could save the country from great danger.

WHILE a house committee is delving into the financial operations of the Townsend plan organization, its founder, Dr. Francis E. Townsend, announced in Washington a complete reorganization of "Old Age Revolving Pensions, Ltd." The shake-up followed a split between Representative John S. McGroarty of California, who has pushed the Townsend plan in the house, and the California doctor. Doctor Townsend accused McGroarty of conniving to convert Townsendites in California to the Democratic party.

Townsend said that henceforth the movement would be managed by a board and that he would present to it 90 per cent of the profits of the Townsend National Weekly. The national headquarters of the movement will be moved from Washington to Chicago, which was chosen for its central location and accessibility.

Another new policy of the movement will be the selection of an auditing firm to regularly audit finances and report to the directors of each of the Townsend clubs.

Townsend will remain as president. His board of directors was named as follows: Gomer Smith, Oklahoma City, vice president; Gilmour Young, San Francisco, national secretary; Dr. Clinton Wunder, New York, J. B. Kiefer, Chicago, Frank Arbuckle, Los Angeles, and Nathan J. Roberts, Jacksonville, regional directors; and Alfred Wright, Cleveland, Ohio, manager.

LEADERS of both major parties are perfecting the arrangements for the national conventions and picking out the chief orators for those occasions. The Republicans have tentatively selected Frank O. Lowden, former governor of Illinois, as temporary chairman and keynoter of the gathering in Cleveland. If this choice stands it is presumed the permanent chairman will be an Easterner, possibly Walter Edge of New Jersey, former ambassador and senator.

F. O. Lowden

Some Western governor is wanted by the Democrats as their keynoter and the honor may be given to Paul V. McNutt of Indiana, C. Ben Ross of Idaho or Clyde C. Herring of Iowa. For permanent chairman at Philadelphia Senator Robinson of Arkansas is likely to be picked. The speech putting President Roosevelt in nomination for a second term may be delivered by Senator Wagner of New York.

New York Republicans of the Old Guard persuasion scored a decisive victory over Senator Borah in the primaries, and the Empire state delegation to Cleveland will be unpledged to any candidate. The triumph of the conservatives was complete. Not only were the Borah candidates defeated in nine congressional districts in which they made contests, but the organization candidates for delegates defeated independent candidates not pledged to Borah in three other districts.

Maine Democrats in their primary pledged their ten convention votes to the renomination of Mr. Roosevelt.

The Kentucky state Republican convention instructed the four state delegates at large to vote for Gov. Alf M. Landon of Kansas for the Presidential nomination. This, with previous developments, assured Landon of 18 of the state's votes.

WILLIAM N. M'NAIR, the Democratic mayor of Pittsburgh, appeared as a witness before the house ways and means committee and was almost thrown out on his ear.

Unable to halt McNair's biting tirade against wasteful spending on the one hand and the proposed new punitive tax on corporation earnings on the other, Chairman Robert L. Doughton threatened to call a policeman bodily to evict the mayor.

"Why all this dignity?" shouted McNair. "Good night!"

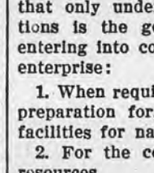
A committee clerk brought a policeman to the front of the room as the congressmen quickly passed a motion to excuse the witness. McNair said he would leave "gladly" and departed.

UNABLE to raise $3,200,000 to redeem two bond issues reaching maturity, the province of Alberta, Canada, defaulted. Premier William Aberhart, leader of the Social Credit party, admitted he could not get the necessary funds. In last fall's election the Social Credit party won a big victory. One of the planks in its platform advocated the payment of $25 of social credit "dividends" monthly to every citizen. None of these dividends has been forthcoming as yet.

CITATIONS were issued by the Post Office department against alleged lottery associations operated by Mrs. Oliver Harriman, prominent in New York society, and Alfred E. Smith, Jr., son of Al Smith. They and others associated with them were summoned to appear in Washington and show cause why fraud orders should not be issued against them.

According to the charge, both persons are operating lotteries. Mrs. Harriman heads the "National Conference on Legalizing Lotteries, Inc.," and Smith heads the "Golden Stakes Sweepstakes."

DESPITE vigorous opposition, which will reappear on the floor of the senate, the senate committee on immigration and naturalization reported favorably the Kerr-Coolidge alien deportation bill, which Secretary Perkins has been trying to get through congress for three years. It will give her and two other members of an interdepartmental board discretionary power to harbor radical and even criminal aliens, otherwise deportable, in this country. The same bill recently was reported favorably by the house committee.



Secretary Perkins

Pending action by congress on the measure, Secretary Perkins has been holding up the deportation of some 2,800 aliens mandatorily deportable under existing law, contending that they are "hardship cases." Some are radicals, some have criminal records, and others entered the country illegally. By "hardship cases" Secretary Perkins means that they would be separated from family ties or put to some other inconvenience.

ACCORDING to the committee on government competition with private enterprise, whose report has been made to the President, that practice is wholly destructive except in situations where the public welfare can only thus be served. "The government's function," the report said, "is to protect economic activities of its citizens and not to supplant them."

The committee unanimously agreed that only under the following conditions is the government justified in entering into competition with private enterprise:

1. When required to assure adequate preparation for, and creation of, the facilities for national defense.

2. For the conservation of natural resources.

3. When private enterprise fails to conduct needed scientific research and exploratory activities to advance industrial development, or in the interest of public health and safety.

4. When private enterprise fails to render a service necessary for the general welfare.

FORMATION of a third national party was suggested in a resolution adopted by the Farmer-Labor party convention at St. Paul, Minn., and the delegates noisily welcomed the hint that Gov. Floyd B. Olson of Minnesota might be its Presidential candidate in 1940. Just now Mr. Olson is after a seat in the senate. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 368½ to 250½ although several leaders pleaded that the move be put off for four years.

Governor Olson said privately that in his opinion the resolution could do no harm since it does not commit the liberals to putting a national ticket in the field this year.

THOUGH Koki Hirota, the new Japanese premier, said a few days ago that while he was in office there would be no war, it is evident his government really is looking for serious trouble with Russia. This feeling is expressed by Eiji Amau, spokesman for the Tokyo foreign office, who said: "Japan must prepare for Soviet aggression."

Eiji Amau

Recent activities indicate the Reds are availing themselves of the critical situation which developed after the recent military revolt in Tokyo and are increasing the strength of their troops along the Manchukuan border.

Amau said the "recent Soviet policy has been to fire on any persons near the border." He said he regards this a rather strange behavior on the part of a "friendly neighbor." He said Premier Hirota had protested the alleged action to K. K. Yurenev, Russian ambassador to Japan.

The tension was increased when Moscow learned there had been heavy fighting in Outer Mongolia, ally of Russia, where Japanese and Manchukuan troops had crossed the border. B. S. Stomaniakov, Soviet vice-commissar for foreign affairs, told Japanese Ambassador Tamekichi Ota that the situation did not permit "waiting pacifically for development of events."

He declared "serious responsibility" would fall on the shoulders of the Japanese government if the fighting in Outer Mongolia were allowed to continue.

At the same time the Manchukuo government issued a warning that unless the Outer Mongolian government "takes immediate steps to terminate all kinds of provocations against Manchukuo's frontiers, the relations of the two countries are threatened with the most serious contingency."

Hachiro Arita, who became foreign minister of Japan, said he did not think the border incidents would break up relations but a recurrence would be dangerous.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

Washington.—The best the American merchant marine can hope for from the present congress is a restoration of the $22,000,000 cut out of the post office appropriation bill. The item approved originally was $26,500,000 for ocean mail carrying, but the senate cut this to $4,500,000.

No one contends that carrying the mails by American ships is worth any such sum as $26,500,000. If it were a question solely of getting the mails carried, there is little doubt that foreign shipowners would bid a lower price than that. And be glad to get it.

The larger sum is paid actually because of the accepted theory that the government must ecourage an American merchant marine, and on two theories. The first theory, of course, is national defense. In the event of war, both the army and navy would need a very large number of auxiliary vessels—boats to carry supplies, oil, food, munitions, etc. In the World war the whole hope of the Germans to win was based on the possible success of their submarine campaign to break this line of supply.

The other reason is the one so frequently stated by President Wilson. He liked the illustration that if one department store used the delivery service of a competitor to send out its merchandise, it would not be long before the one depending on the other for trucks or wagons would be forced out of business, even if it saved money by utilizing the service during the first few months or years.

Mr. Wilson was very forcibly impressed with the advantages that Germany and Britain had gained in the period prior to the war by having their own trade routes to South America where he was anxious, as has been every subsequent President, to build up American trade.

There's the Question

If these two reasons for having an American merchant marine are accepted, the question then comes of how to make it possible. There has been such violent objection to the word subsidy that the straightforward course of encouraging the construction and operation of ships under the American flag has never been possible. Even with the huge Republican majority that resulted from the 1920 election, it was never possible to get such a measure through congress. The late Senator Jacob H. Gallinger of New Hampshire again and again deplored the fact that despite an almost universal desire to build up an American merchant marine congress was never willing to aid it except by subterfuge.

This subterfuge, of course, has always been the mail subvention—paying ship owners a great deal more for carrying the mail than the service is worth.

But, due to the regulations and requirements of the shipping board (originally set up by President Wilson for no other purpose than to foster an American merchant marine), much of the money spent to aid American shipping has been pure waste. With the best intentions in the world, millions were wasted in aiding the financing of vessels, or the purchasing of ships taken over by the government after the war, and then forcing the operation of those ships in an uneconomic way.

The famous Leviathan is a classic example. The federal treasury would be ahead something in excess of $15,000,000, at a minimum, if that giant vessel had been towed out to sea and sunk as soon as the last soldier was brought home from France.

Instead the government spent $10,000,000 in reconditioning her, turning her into an oil burner, etc., and then, after leasing her to private ownerships, lost money on her every year since. Moreover, the private interests that leased her also lost money on every trip she made.

Which would seem to indicate that perhaps there are some fundamental things to be cleared up, such as artificial operating expenses forced by law and governmental regulations, before very much hope can be had for an adequate American merchant marine.

Boost Excise Taxes

The proposed excise taxes, which, levied on 33 commodities, were calculated to raise $221,000,000 a year, are not dead. They are just pushed under the pile for a few days. In fact, the best judgment on Capitol hill and in the Treasury department is that they will not only be revived, but will be increased.

Treasury experts have been working on this whole problem for months. They know very accurately what can and what cannot be done in the way of raising revenue. The point is that they know congress will never enact it without so many exemptions and loopholes that it would not produce anything like the revenue required.

Moreover, the President did not contemplate enactment of the tax plan without the excise taxes. So that, in addition to writing in all kinds of exemptions, the proposal of the Hill subcommittee would strike $221,000,000 of annual revenue from the bill.

There is a further element which puts the whole house subcommittee program into red ink, the treasury experts privately point out. This is that the committee counts on $100,000,000 from the "windfall" tax. No one in the treasury has ever really taken that tax seriously. As a matter of fact treasury experts do not think the President had figured on it seriously as a revenue raiser. Its purpose was far more propaganda than as a money producer.

It was intended to hold up before the country the interests that profited from the Supreme court decision invalidating the AAA and outlawing the processing taxes.

Difficulties in Way

Constitutional difficulties of actually collecting the tax are something else again, and so the treasury experts who figured out the tax schedules just put that to one side, as far as any reliance on revenue was concerned.

Meanwhile the hearings scheduled by the house committee, and those which will follow when the measure gets before the senate finance committee, will riddle the whole idea that a change in the corporation taxes will produce the needed revenue without that very substantial part of the whole tax scheme which the President himself included, the excise taxes.

It has been no secret from the first that the senate would rewrite the whole bill. Members of the house admit that freely. Administration leaders in the senate like Pat Harrison, chairman of the finance committee, will do their best to follow the President's ideas as closely as possible.

Expectation has been all along that, in order to make sure of enough money, they would be forced to retain the present corporation levies in whole or in part—the tax on all net earnings of corporations, now 15 per cent on all corporations of any size, the capital stock tax, and the excess profits tax. In fact, there has been a strong tendency to save all these taxes, intact, and add on enough of the tax on undistributed earnings as proposed by the President to make up the additional amount needed.

This additional amount, by the way, is roughly $792,000,000 a year, less whatever is raised by processing taxes and the windfall taxes.

Government Ownership

Flood disasters spell a tremendous boom in government ownership of electric power plants. Congress is in a liberal mood with respect to flood relief, but it is also ready to go further in the direction President Roosevelt has always desired in bringing about publicly owned power systems.

Even in the direct relief, which will of course be followed by vast works aimed at lessening the proportions of such disasters, there is a notable advantage to "publicly owned" utilities. For instance, consider two electric plants, one publicly owned, one privately owned, at nearby towns on the same river. It could be the Merrimac, or the Connecticut, or the Allegheny or any river hit in the recent floods.

Money already allocated by the President is available for "replacement" of the publicly owned plant. The stockholders of the privately owned plant must take their loss, unless they have flood insurance.

It is for the future that the development is really important, however. There will be a wave of dam building, aimed at holding back future flood waters, and utilizing the water meantime for the generation of elecricity in publicly owned power plants. These naturally must sell their electricity somewhere—the Supreme court upheld that in the TVA case even if it did not specifically mention flood control. But it did say with great clarity that the government had the right to sell surplus power developed incidentally to some constitutional project.

So that actually all the 60-odd injunctions by the private utilities against PWA loans for power plants seem a great deal less important than they appeared to be a few weeks back.

Flood Control

The amount of money which will be spent on these flood control projects will stagger the imagination, when added up, as for instance in a general flood control bill. Senator Francis G. Newlands, 25 years ago, was regarded as a nuisance because he talked about spending a couple of hundred million dollars for both flood control and reclamation.

Congress at this very session will seriously be considering spending several billion dollars for flood control alone, and without covering the entire country at that.

One bill, introduced by Senator Joseph F. Guffey of Pennsylvania, and providing for flood control works in the Ohio basin above Pittsburgh, would appropriate more than fifty-five million dollars. This would cover the Allegheny, Monongahela, Juniata and one or two smaller streams.

There is no way of figuring just how far it will go, certainly no predicting till the President gets back from his fishing trip, finds the relief part of the job pretty well covered, and interest centered on the prevention of future disasters.

He will find Harold L. Ickes enthusiastic. Ickes' nose has been pretty well out of joint since the relief message. The President had decided to turn all the relief spending over to Harry L. Hopkins' WPA. But dams and power plants are right down Ickes' alley. The WPA, however, say they can award contracts as easily as anybody else.

But from the present attitude of congress there will be plenty for all, enough to make everybody happy except the would-be budget balancers.

"D'you think we could get that man, sir? We could have had the others time and again. Bugle, and Rush, I mean—though we could have had Dewdrop, too. But Mr. Bohun says, 'No, Bugle and Rush,' he says, 'is our information bureau. So we won't do them in,' he says; 'if there's any news goin' they'll have it.' But you wouldn't believe how we've laid an' laid for Pharaoh—and missed him every time. Look at tonight, sir. I'd been lyin' there where I met you since half-past six. Keepin' observation, I was, for Mr. Bohun's at Salzburg—I've told you that. To beat up his quarters, he said, in case you'd called. Well, I thought I had got him tonight, when the Rolls slowed down. I was ready to blow his head off—an' then it turns out that it's you. I don't believe in charmed lives, but if ever a blackguard had one, Pharaoh's him."

"You wait, Barley," said I, and got into the car. "When d'you expect Mr. Bohun?"

"Tomorrow morning, sir. About seven o'clock."

"What could be better?" said I. "Tell him to expect me for breakfast at about a quarter to nine. And that after that, if he likes, we'll run along to Plumage and close the information bureau."

As I let in the clutch—

"Good-by, Barley," cried Helena. "Do what you can for his lordship and ask Mr. Bohun to forgive me for making free with his room."

But Barley made no answer. I think he was incapable of speech.

We were back at the castle within a quarter of an hour.

As the warden stepped out of the wicket, Helena spoke.

"Has anyone entered the castle since I've been gone?"

The porter replied:

"No one at all, my lady."

I had known that would be his answer, but the words were comfortable words. The race had been ours all the way, but now we knew it was over and the numbers were up.

Helena was addressing the warden.

"He's not been to the station, Florin. Unless he's here, he must have gone somewhere by car."

"His lordship's not here, my lady. And the Adelaide postern was open which shows that he went that way."

I drove the Rolls under the archway and into the small courtyard.

As the leaves were closed behind us "Out of sight of the wicket," said Helena.

There was just enough room to berth the car out of view.

Helena turned to the warden, who had opened the door by her side.

"The porter is to put out his lights, but stay in his lodge. He is to open to no one, until you return. Mark that. To no one at all. And in five minutes' time you and all the night-watchmen will come to the library."

"If your ladyship pleases," said Florin.

Helena left the car, and I followed her up the stairs. . . .

As I closed the library door, my lady took off her hat, pitched it on to a sofa and moved to the hearth.

"What are you going to tell them?"

For a moment she did not answer, but stood with her eyes on the flames. Then—

"That the man that murdered young Florin is coming to the castle tonight; that three hours ago he did his best to kill you, because he knows you can prove that he took young Florin's life; that they know him as 'Captain Faning,' but that I know him as 'Pharaoh'—a very dangerous felon, who is wanted for at least four murders in England alone." She turned to set her hands on my shoulders. "You must forgive me, darling, for playing this hand alone. But now you must stay in the background until we're through. They must not begin to believe that I'm acting on your advice. Now that Valentine's out of the way, my authority here is supreme, but I'm putting a strain upon it when I use my brother's absence to order the death of his guest. Tomorrow—this afternoon you'll stand on another footing, for everyone in the castle will know I'm to be your wife."

I could not answer her, but I put my arms around her and kissed her lips.

And then the light in her face went out.

The lips I had kissed were moving, but no words came . . . and her little hands were trembling . . . and the blood was out of her face.

She was looking over my shoulder—not so much with horror as dully, as though the battle were hopeless and she was tired.

As I let her go and swung round—

"Don't move, Mr. Spencer," said Pharaoh. "The trigger they give these things are absurdly light."

"This thing" was an automatic pistol, pointing in my direction, about six paces away.

CHAPTER VIII

I Bear a Message.

I confess that I was dumbfounded, and several seconds went by before I could find my tongue.

"That's so much bluff," said I. "This isn't the forester's cottage. If you fire on me here—"

"I most frankly admit," said Pharaoh, "that the feelings with which I should kill you would be extremely mixed. To be still more frank, I don't want you to force my hand. Not that I value your life. In fact, you're rather a nuisance. But if I were to—er—abate you, I should probably have to withdraw—and that wouldn't suit my book. But for you to take any action would suit my book even less. And so, if you move, I shall fire. . . . I'm sure Lady Helena favors my point of view."

"Yes," said Helena, quietly. "I see your point. Don't move, John, I beg you. He means what he says."

"He does indeed," said Pharaoh.

With his words a knock fell upon the door. . . .

"Ah," said Pharaoh. "The trusty warden, no doubt. 'With his white hair unbonneted, the stout old sheriff comes; behind him march the halberdiers . . .' I think you were going to tell him something, Lady Helen. Well, do have him in. But perhaps I ought to remind you that Mr. Spencer's life will depend upon what you say."

The pistol slid into his pocket; but though he withdrew his left hand, his right hand stayed where it was.

Again the warden knocked, and Helena raised her voice and cried to him to come in.

The warden entered the room.

As his eyes lit upon Pharaoh, he started, as though in surprise; then he closed the door behind him and turned to where Helena stood.

My lady moistened her lips.

"I'm not at all satisfied, Florin, with the watch that is being kept. Here's Captain Faning returned, but he was never challenged or—"

"I found a postern open," said Pharaoh. "To save the porter trouble, I entered by that."

"He should have been seen," said Helena, "crossing the bridge."

The warden looked greatly concerned.

"There is something amiss, my lady—I know not what. I will swear that Hubert is faithful and Piers, who is "That's So Much Bluff," Said I.

watchman tonight, is a man of his word. Yet, as I tell them, they might have no eyes nor ears."

"There is something amiss," said Helena. "Double the watchmen, Florin, and stop all leave. Two porters are to stay in the lodge and to keep a list of all persons that use the bridge. No postern is to be opened without permission from me. Why were the servants abed when I came in?"

"By his lordship's orders, my lady."

"Those orders are cancelled—until his lordship returns. And now rouse his lordship's valet and let him prepare the room in the eastern tower—the room above mine. Mr. Spencer will sleep there tonight. And rouse Rachel, as well. She will make my room ready and wait till I come. One thing more." She drew out her master key. "Here is my key, Florin. You may as well keep it for me until I need it again."

The warden bowed and took it.

"Will your ladyship speak to the men?"

"Not tonight. I've changed my mind. But please see that they do their duty. I've a definite feeling of danger—very pressing danger, Florin; so please beware."

"Rest assured, my lady, nothing that I can do shall be left undone."

Helena smiled and nodded, and the warden bowed low. Then he bowed to me, but not Pharaoh, and left the room.

"I congratulate you," said Pharaoh, "upon your quickness of wit. I had to give you some rope and you used it all."

Helena took her seat in a high-backed chair.

"I rather fancy," she said, "you'd have done the same."

"I don't know that I should have," said Pharaoh, wrinkling his brow. "I believe in a margin of safety. . . . Now why do you think the warden ignored me when he went out?"

Helena shrugged her shoulders.

"Perhaps you don't command his respect."

Pharaoh fingered his chin.

"Dewdrop," he said quietly.

One of the curtains swayed, and Dewdrop stepped out.

"Concentrate on that warden, Dewdrop. You heard what her ladyship said. If he seems to be getting ideas, you must act for the best. The situation is delicate, Dewdrop, for what are we among so many? And now cover Mr. Spencer. I want to talk."

As Dewdrop moved towards me, he took his seat on a sofa and crossed his legs.

Pharaoh was looking at Helena, smiling an insolent smile.

"I'm afraid it's clear," he drawled, "that you didn't expect me so soon." He sighed. "That's been the misfortune of so many people I've known. Some of them are still living. You see, a car came by, and its owner gave me a lift. To be perfectly frank, he surrendered the wheel to Dewdrop without a word. You know, I can't help feeling you ought to have thought of that."

"I agree," said Helena, shortly. "That was a bad mistake."

"But the only one," said Pharaoh. "Indeed, if I may say so, I'm much impressed. Mr. Spencer's quite a good chauffeur—I'm sure of that, but only a brain in a thousand would have thought of abducting the Count."

Helena stared.

"Are you being humorous?"

"No," said Pharaoh quietly. "I'm simply giving you the answer to a simple addition sum. As it's very short, I'll do it over again. . . . You left the castle as I was approaching the bridge. In fact, I was able to cross it while Hubert—the faithful Hubert—was closing the wicket, before he re-entered the lodge. That's why he didn't see me. But that's by the way. . . . Well, I found your departure astounding. I mean, on the face of it, once you had gained the castle, to deliberately leave it was the act of a fool. But you are no fool, Lady Helena. . . . I was still considering this paradox, when I found the postern ajar. I confess that helped me a lot—in more ways than one. And the moment I heard that the Count of Yorick was missing, the sum came out." He uncrossed his legs and leaned forward. "Let me put some cards on the table. I want you to see that, if for no other reason, because you have scruples you are weighted clean out of this race. You see, I am not so embarrassed—I never am. Now take tonight. Placed as you were, once I was back in the castle, nothing this side of hell would have got me out. Yet the Count would have disappeared. Now there's a little problem—which I will resolve. I assume he was drunk—forgive me, but he usually is by ten. Well, they say blood's thicker than water, but I never found it so. I should have dropped him gently into the moat. . . . Perhaps you think I'm bluffing. Let me tell you what happened tonight. I wanted a car—badly, and I took the first that came by. Well, that was against the law. By taking that car I offended the law and order—two inconvenient gods. They therefore had to be sidetracked. . . . What is left of that car is lying on its side in a gully, it's still burning—with the man it belonged to inside."

This recital was dreadful enough, but Pharaoh lent it a horror that made my blood run cold.

"Are you seeking to frighten us?" Helena said.

Pharaoh sat back.

"No," he said, smiling. "Only to open your eyes."

He glanced at his watch. "Dear, dear, a quarter to two. It's far too late to discuss my mission tonight. If you'll promise me one or two things—well, I daresay your room is ready—" he raised his eyes to the ceiling "—and the room above yours."

"You insolent swine!" I roared. "If you think—"

The sentence ended in a manner which I should like to forget. I yelped with pain, leaped from my seat on the table and swung about, smarting and furious, to face Dewdrop's leveled pistol some three feet away.

The Jew had pricked my buttock with the blade of his knife.

I hesitated, trembling with rage and desperately weighing the chances of an immediate attack. Fire upon me they dared not.

Helena's arm was about my shoulders, and her cool, slim hand on my wrist.

"Not that way, my darling, I beg you. Let me play the hand."

"I entirely agree," said Pharaoh. "You're much too mutton-fisted. But you mustn't become abusive. That's really all Dewdrop meant."

"All right," I said thickly. "You play it. I'll manage to bide my time."

The clasp on my shoulders tightened, but that was all.

"What terms," said Helena, quietly, "do you suggest?"

"Your word that you will do nothing before midday. That at that hour you two will be here, to take up the same positions you now lay down. That you will give no orders and make no sort of statement which might correct the impression that I am your guest. In a word, I desire your parole—the parole of you both."

"I give it," said Helena, quietly.

"And Mr. Spencer?" said Pharaoh.

Before I could speak—

"I pledge his word," said Helena.

"That's good enough," said Pharaoh. "Allow me to wish you good night." He bowed and turned to the door. "Come, Dewdrop," he said.

* * * * * * *

Half an hour had gone by, and I was sitting, brooding, on the side of my bed. I was clad in the Count's pajamas and was wearing his dressing-gown. I had cleansed myself in the bathroom and staunched my wound. This, of course, was nothing, but because it was deep, it had bled a deal more freely than I had supposed. It certainly ached a little, but I was more hungry than hurt.

I needed food very badly—to help me, body and soul. Sleep was out of the question. Besides, I did not feel tired. . . .

Lloyd George, who ran the big war for England and won with the help of old Clemenceau, not sympathetic with France this time, says England is dangerously involved and "we shall send our young men to die, this time on German soil, to punish these arrogant and aggressive Teutons for daring to make preparations for the defense of their own soil against a foreign invader."

Arthur Brisbane

Lloyd George is bitter in his denunciation of the suggestion that England be dragged into another war. "France," says he, "can spend $500,000,000 on the erection of huge fortifications. We can vote plans which involve expenditure of an extra fifteen hundred million dollars for protection. But if the Germans propose to throw up even a pillbox to guard their famous cities and their greatest industrial area . . . then 'measures must be concerted' between the general army staffs of Britain and France."

The "fastest" double star is found, and that is the big news. "Twin suns" close together, in the constellation of Ophiuchus, revolve completely around each other in twenty months. The shortest period of revolution for any other "binary" star is five years. Some revolve only once in a hundred years.

Nature is both fast and slow; the electron in the atom revolves around the proton thousands of millions of times in a second. The lens-shaped Milky Way above your head, in which our sun is one of thirty thousand million specks of light, revolves once in 225,000,000 years. No limit to bigness, no limit to smallness, apparently.

That naval conference in London ends, quite to the satisfaction of England, with the situation about as it was when Hiram Johnson of California put the situation in these few words:

"Great Britain builds as she prefers; the United States builds as Great Britain permits."

England actually says to the United States, "You must build no more cruisers with eight-inch guns; we do not like them." And the United States humbly says, "All right, then we shall not build any."

It is the old story: England has statesmen, we have politicians—and some of them are Anglomaniac snobs.

Big business, like little business, has had its trouble, but here and there it is still big business. In his annual report for General Motors, Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., reports net sales last year amounting to $1,155,641,511, against $862,672,670 the year before; a gain of more than two hundred and ninety-two million dollars. That means many new cars, and families made happier. The company paid out in wages more than three hundred and twenty-three million dollars, not including wages paid indirectly to thousands of workers producing materials of which automobiles are made.

Sixty of Mussolini's planes have wiped out Harar, Ethiopia's second biggest city, one of 40,000 inhabitants. "Civilized" Europe, England leading, bemoans the fact that a Mohammedan mosque, the Coptic cathedral and a Catholic church were blasted.

They forget what happened in the big war, at Rheims, Louvain and elsewhere, and the German cannon "Big Bertha" throwing at Paris shells that might well have wrecked Notre Dame, the Madeleine or the Sainte Chapelle.

War is as ruthless as was nature in the earthquake that destroyed the great cathedral of Lisbon, killing thousands that had gathered there seeking divine protection.

When Pittsburgh is through with the disaster that has almost overwhelmed the city, a monument should be erected in a park, or on the mountainside, in honor of the courage and recuperative energy of the great industrial city. With lights turned off, water flooding the streets, many men and women calmly continued their work, wearing coal miners' light-bearing caps, like so many gigantic glow worms. Americans still possess resourcefulness and can do what they must do.

"To him that hath shall be given," even in Wall street speculation.

Beginning May 1, if you buy $100 worth of stocks, you must put $55 of your own into the deal. This will compel small fish to operate on a small scale and get rich slowly, if at all.

It has been suggested here often that airplanes might fight forest fires, possibly by laying down from overhead a soapy layer to shut out oxygen. Utah's officials have planned a new parachute, instantaneously opening, that would land from one to six firefighters and apparatus from planes, wherever desired.

Before Long Supervision Will Be Our Only Task

Inventive science and new machinery have changed everything. Where the worker formerly began and finished one complete article, he now attends to one small operation, turning a few screws, putting on a wheel, driving a few nails, spraying with paint, tacking on heels or uppers.

With electricity everywhere, work has changed. The housewife turns a switch, a machine does the washing; a vacuum cleaner does the sweeping; turns another switch or burner and finds "heat" ready-made.

Everything is time-saving, trouble-saving. The people do their shopping, selecting at home in the advertising column, and through advertising they learn of things unknown to them before and find that they need them. Civilization approaches the stage when pressing a button and starting the machinery working will represent a physical day's labor, with only supervision afterward.—Arthur Brisbane in Cosmopolitan.

Man's Friends Glad He Told Them About Black-Draught

Writing from Texarkana, Texas, Mr. W. T. Bentley, of that city, says: "I have been using Black-Draught for fully forty years. I would have a bad taste in my mouth and headache. I knew I needed a laxative—something to cleanse the system. I would hunt up the Black-Draught and take a dose. I would be relieved in a few hours. In Black-Draught I have found a simple remedy — one that does not have any after-effects. I do not know of anything better to take for a dull, tired, listless feeling. I have recommended Black-Draught to many friends and neighbors. I know they have been glad that I did, for they have said so."

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HUGO BLACK

Senator John H. Bankhead has been of invaluable service to the present Democratic Administration in Washington. He has consistently fought for the great masses of the people. He is the staunch champion of agriculture in the United States Senate and is recognized as an outstanding leader in all legislation for the benefit of the farmers of Alabama and America.

His experience and work in the United States Senate for the five years in which he has served have qualified him to continue to render a still more splendid service as a United States Senator from Alabama. The qualifications and prestige acquired by him from this experience constitute a distinct asset to the people of Alabama and I am absolutely confident that they fully recognize this fact.

Senator Bankhead has recently been sick with influenza, and while he is rapidly recuperating from his illness, he cannot at this time make an active campaign among his friends in Alabama. He has no campaign manager and no state-wide organization to carry on his campaign for him. He must, therefore, depend upon the voluntary activities of his friends and supporters in Alabama to secure the overwhelming endorsement which they will give him at the polls.

Many of Senator Bankhead's friends have indicated to me that they want to take some steps to bring about a full vote in the Democratic Primary on May 5th. They express complete confidence that Senator Bankhead will carry every precinct in every county of Alabama, but are fearful that the general expectation of his certain victory will cause many to remain away from the polls.

In view of the fact that there are vital matters still to be decided in the United States Senate at this session and because the people of Alabama need Senator Bankhead back in the Senate as soon as he is able to return, I am prompted to recommend that Senator Bankhead's friends hold meetings in every county of Alabama. For that reason I am suggesting that on Saturday the eighteenth (18th) day of April, at 11:00 o'clock, A. M. the friends of Senator Bankhead meet at every County Courthouse in the State. At these meetings his friends and supporters can make plans to urge a full vote in the counties. I am sure that such action would bring about a much larger vote in the Democratic Primary. This would be a great and well-deserved tribute to a faithful public servant and would undoubtedly be greatly appreciated by him. An overwhelming majority for Senator Bankhead will give him additional power and prestige in the Senate in the efforts he is making for our people.

A STATEMENT TO THE PEOPLE OF SHELBY COUNTY.

(From the files of the Shelby County Democrat, four years ago)

It has been brought to our attention that certain parties in Shelby County have been spreading the news that the Shelby County Democrat, a newly organized newspaper publication for Shelby County, is a "fly by night" organization and that the paper will not last three months.

The Democrat wants to make itself clear, now and for all times to come—We are in Shelby County to stay! We have already made ourselves clear on political issues.

If the merchants and citizens of Shelby County want a paper, one that is founded on the Democratic principles of the South, we are here to give it to them without flinching.

In establishing the Democrat in Shelby County, we did so with the feeling that the citizenry of the County were in need of a paper that stands for the principles of Jefferson. It was upon this principle we were founded and upon this feeling that we entered Shelby County., and we have been met and assured the loyal support of this citizenry and her merchants, and in turn we are giving them herewith again our assurance that the DEMOCRAT will continue to operate in Shelby County and in Columbiana through the years to come."

We are in Shelby County and the City of Columbiana to stay!

The above Editorial written four years ago still rings true as to the purpose of our organization. We believe in the Democratic Government. "It has been tried in peace and it has been tried in War, and has proved itself fit for both. It has been assailed from without, and it has successfully resisted the shock; it has been disturned within, and it has effectually quieted the disturbance. It can stand trial, it can stand assail, it can stand adversity, it can stand everything but the marring of its own beauty and the weakening of its own strength. It can stand everything but the effects of our own rashness and our own folly. It can stand everything but DISORGANIZATION, DISUNION and NULLIFICATION." Shall we not pull together?

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

It shouldn't be long before the woods should be filled with Scouts looking for some good place to be used for a summer camp. That is if you haven't already been out to pay Mother Nature a nice long visit and select your place to visit during the summer months.

Of course, you don't have to be told that this should require some time. Whe none is about to select the place that he is about to make his summer home, he should exercise quite a bit of care and skill.

This, t osome people might not seem to be such a job as it really is, But of course, Scouts will not doubt this at all, for they know the necessity of a good camp. Especially if they have ever been compelled to use a camp that is not what it shoud be and during a bad hard rain or something of that sort.

When selecting a camp, great care should be taken to select a place that will drain well after a hard rain. The ground should be hard and firm and have a genera lslope so as to allow the water to drain hurredly. This slope should be a grassy one if it is at all possible.

And don't forget, a good spring is just as necessary or even more so than the site chosen for the pitching of the tents

The spring should be located close enough to camp so as to be con venient to reach quickly. First, the spring should be given a thorough cleaning if it shows any signs of needing one. And too, if necessary fresh clean pebbles should be placed in the bottom of it.

If it is at all possible there should be a good clean swimming hole reasonably close to the camp. This should be used only with the Scoutmasters consent, and when there is someone to look after the swimmers Scouts should never swim without a water buddy.

Of curse, it may be difficult or even impossible to find a camp of thsi type anywhere within hiking distance of the Troop Headquarters. At any rate you may do your best to find a camp that has all these things, and you know what to look for.

Wilton Troop Notes

On April 1st, the Wilton Troop celebrated its first anniversary.

Tuesday evening at seven o'clock, the Troop held a special meeting at the Troop Room and planned a camp for the week end. They will go to Camp Cooper in Bibb County.

The arrowhead contest is still going strong with quite a number of Scouts scrapping hard to finish high man. The boys have already turned in about 225 arrowheads. The contest will close April 1.

Winston Hogan, Scribe.

How about those Troop notes from Montevallo, Vincent and Columbiana Cooperon fellows and send those notes in to the Column and lets make this column something to look forward to each week.

Columbiana Scouts may just leave their Troop News at the Democrat office.

Has it ever occurred to you that the Democrat allows more space to the Shelby County Scouts than the Birmingham Scouts receive in any regular allotted space?

He asks for support by the ladies and gentlemen Democrats who have gray in their hair those also who will cast their first ballots on May 5th, 1936, and those of all ages in between the other two classes. His platform includes the idea that the Farmer should earn more for his produce than the cost of production in order that he might spend and thus aid all other businesses and adequate pensions for the aged.

PLATFORM OF THOS. H. MAXWELL FOR CONGRESS

THOS. H. MAXWELL of Tuscaloosa, Ala., Route 1, candidate for Congressman from the Sixth District, composed of Chilton, Bibb, Greene, Hale, Perry, Shelby, Sumter and Tuscaloosa Counties, is a Veteran of two wars.

PLATFORM

I am not on a privately owned corporation or state payroll and am backed by no Clique or ring.

I favor such legislation that the farmer receive more than cost for his products, that he spend money and thus aid all other vocations. Such is the main objective of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Therefore, let us have:

1. Collective bargaining for the organized farmer and organized industrial labor.
2. The thirty hour week in manufacturing to distribute the opportunities lessened by labor saving machinery.
3. Pensions paid wholly by the Federal Government, administered by states, of $30.00 per month to all persons of sixty or more years, whose incomes are less than $1,000.-00 per year, which plank the gray haired, young and middle aged should support.
4. Federal loans at one-half of one per cent per annum to sovereign states for use in their schools, liquidating borrowed indebtedness, and for other purposes.
5. Erosion control for soil conservation.
6. Flood control with incidental conservation of power to be used in country homes.
7. A sufficiency of Constitutional money for conducting the nation's business without borrowing.

Pass this word by letter or post card or phone to the counties.

Bibb, Chilton, Greene, Hale, Perry Shelby, Sumter, Tucsaloosa, that every farm voter rally to polls on May 5th, 1936, rain or shine to elect their man while the other citizens are willing to vote for him. This is the splendid opportunity for Congress by properly applying the best of Constitutions can make the people happy and panicless.

Sincerely,

THOMAS H. MAXWELL,

(Paid pol. adv. by Thos. H. Maxwell, Tuscaloosa, Ala., Rt. 1)

Best Cotton Spacing Given By Funchess

Experiments by the Alabama Experiment Station show that "much of the cotton planted in Alabama should be on 2 1-2 foot rows with 2 stalks per hill 18 inches apart," says Dean M. J. Funchess, in explaining that "our results indicate strongly that this is by far the best spacing where low to modest yields are to be expected."

"The evidence indicated that in general best yields of cotton may be had from spacing that involved not less than 8,000 stalks per acre and not more than 25,000 stalks per acre he says." All the work indicates that where something like a bale of cotton per acre is possible the hills should be something like 18 inches apart and the rows about 3 1-2 feet wide, with 1, 2, or 3 stalks per hill. However, where no fertilizer was used decidedly the best yield was obtained from 2 1-2 foot rows with hills 18 inches apart. At this spacing the yield was 124 pounds per acre greater than with the next best spacing which was 3 1-2 foot rows, hills 15 inches apart."

A first class price doesn't always indicate a first class hotel.

RESOLUTION

WHEREAS Southern farmers pooled mllions of bales of cotton with the Government under the 10 and 12 cent loan hoping to get 20 cents a pound for it, and

WHEREAS it is admitted that cotton should be 20 cents a pound, and

WHEREAS speculators have been permitted to sell to themselves and among themselves for the past two years more than three hundred million bales of cotton they never had and never expected to have merely to depress the price of cotton and rob the farmers of half its value and

WHEREAS they are now selling cotton down and threaten to depress the price below the 10 cent loan and not only rob the farmers of more than four hundred million dollars and cause the Government to lose more than three hundred million dollars and people be taxed to pay it and

WHEREAS Congress is the only power that can fix and protect the price of cotton, prohibit importation of cotton until manufacturers have used all the cotton of American farmers and prohibit short selling.

Now, therefore be it resolved That we the Shelby County Farmers union in convention assembled demand that our Representatives and Senators in Congress from Alabama do everything in their power to obtain the passage of a law fixing the price of cotton at not less than twenty cents a pound, prohibiting importation of cotton until the manufacturers have used all the cotton of the American farmer and prohibiting contracts for sale of cotton on the exchanes at any price except that fixed by the Government under penalty of fine and imprisonment.

Be it resolved further that copies of this Resolution be furnished the newspapers with request for publication.

Some Work Mules Should Be Clipped

Unless shedding takes place promptly and thoroughly in the Spring, work horses and mules should be clipped as soon as danger of cold spells is over.

In case of a severe drop in temperature after the animal has been clipped, blanketing for the night is advisable.

Dairy Production Increase Expected

Increased production of dairy products is in prospect this spring since the relationship between prices of feeds and dairy products are favorable for dairy production, according to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

Hog Production Is Increasing

After two years of decline, hog production is increasing in the United States and Denmark, according to the U. S. Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

Increased production is also in prospect in Germany and the Nether lands, but in most other continental European countries the number of hogs is unlikely to increase during the first half of this year.

The Bureau predicts that there will be a "material increase" in the exports of United States pork and lard during the next two years.

Many a man wh ois cramped for time in this world may have it to burn in the next.

Screw Worms Appear In Southern States

Screw worms have already made their appearance in southern Florida and in a few scattered areas of Georgia,

As the weather becomes warmer, the pests will multiply and spread unless stockmen apply effective preventive measures the pest promises to become a serious problem again this year in the Southern states.

Frequent examinations of all live stock and prompt treatment with pine tar oil of every scratch, sore, and cut is an effective way to stop multiplication of the pest.

Federal Gasoline taxes, costing $170,000,000 yearly, would build 17,000 miles of farm-to-market roads every year. IF the money was spent for roads. (It Isn't!)

MISS BLACK MARRIED TO AUBREY TAYLOR MARCH 29, 1936, IN MONTEVALLO

The wedding of Miss Lucyle Black yuongest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Lee Black, of Montevallo, and Aubrey A. Taylor, only son of Mr. and Mrs. Roland W. Taylor of Clanton, took place Sunday afternoon, March 29, at 3 o'clock in the home of the bride's parents, with only the immediate families present.

Ferns and baskets of Easter lillies in front of the high mantel formed a pretty background for the impressive ring ceremony, which was read by the Rev. Fred B. Pearson, pastor of the Montevallo Baptist Church.

The bride, given in marriage by her father, was gowned in a lovely silver gray dress with all accessories in navy. She carried an arm bouquet of sweetheart roses and valley lillies.

The bride is a member of families long identified in the social and civic activities of Alabama. She is a sister of Hollis O. Black, attorney, formerly of Birmingham, but now of Washington, D. C., and is a niece of Senator Hugo L. Black. The bride attended Alabama College where hse was an outstanding and popular student.

Mr. Taylor attended Alabama Polytechnic Institute at Auburn, where he received his degree in electrical engineering. He was a prominent mmber of Theta Upsilon Omega Fraternity. Since graduation he has been engaged in business with his father.

It took 18 policemen to subdue John Tierney,45, "bouncer" in a Chicago tavern, after he chased his wife about the hallway outside their apartment.

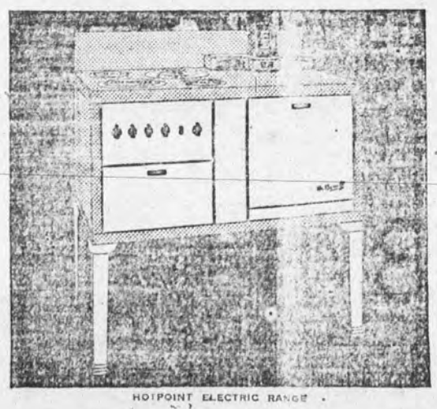
IT IS ECONOMICAL

IN FACT some women say that, taking into consideration the CHEAP ELECTRICITY to operate an Electric Range and all other advantages of cooking electrically—such as cleanliness, safety, the better results obtainable, and the convenience of the range doing the cooking while its owner can be miles away—



HOTPOINT ELECTRIC RANGE

COOKING ELECTRICALLY IS THE MOST ECONOMICAL WAY OF COOKING THERE IS!

But even if you choose to consider only the cost of the current, an Electric Range is economical—so low are electric rates in Alabama.

So why deny yourself longer the pleasures of an Electric Range?

Come to our showroom, or that of another electric range merchant, select the model that pleases you, make a down payment pleasantly small (as little as $2.50 on some models) and

Social and Personal Mention

MILDRED WHITE WALLACE, Social Editor

APRIL 9, 1936

GREETINGS! SALUTATIONS AND MANY THANKS TO SUBSCRIBERS AND FRIENDS — DEMOCRATS AND REPUBLICANS — THROUGHOUT SHELBY COUNTY FROM THE OFFICIAL STAFF OF THE SHELBY COUNTY DEMOCRAT, AND FROM THE LITTLE DEMOCRATIC DONKEY HIMSELF WHO IS, THIS VERY DAY, RACING AROUND IN EVERY PRECINCT IN OUR COUNTY BRAYING HIS APPROVAL OF THE NEW DEAL AND PATIENTLY CARRYING HIS LOAD OF THE ADVERSE CRITICISM HE MAY HAVE ENCOUNTERED ALONG THE HIGHWAYS HE HAS TRAVERSED SINCE HE MADE HIS FIRST APPEARANCE ON MAIN STREET IN COLUMBIANA, EXACTLY FOUR YEARS AGO THIS WEEK!

Looking back, in retrospective mood, thru the pages of the first edition of the Shelby Cunty Democrat, we vividly recall the reaction on various people caused by the appearance of this rather wobbly little Democratic Donkey on Main Street We remember the automobile bearing the initial copies of the Democrat (before we had installed our own machinery in Columbiana) was parked in front of that always interesting emporium known as—the Village Post Office. We recall the mad scramble for copies!

There were some who had come to see IT! Others to mock and jeer! Some, patriotically inclined, were on hand to encourage the new enterprise! Others eager to read it! Many prophetic remarks fell from the lips of skeptical folk predicting just how long the paper would live! We remember these remarks, and the people who made them. However, after 208 consecutive issues of the Democrat, we believe we have over come most of our unfriendly opposition—that we have made new friends, and fortunately for us, have retained the valuable old tried and true ones!

We make the above assertion, not in a spirit of egotism, but with the firm belief that—to the best of our ability, we have conscientiously fostered and upheld the principle upon which the paper was founded. We believe the PRINCIPLE was worth fighting for, and we further believe we have proven the intrinsic worth and permanency of our organization. We also believe we have convinced the doubtful ones that we are now a vital part of Shelby County's progressive life.

We have received, since last weeks issue of the Democrat, in which we referred to our 4th anniversary celebration, more favorable comments from all sections of the County than we, even in our most optimistic mood, had dared hope. There have come to this little desk, letters of congratulations, bearing friendly encouragement, bespeaking continued loyalty and interest. The "right-behind-you" priceless kind! And right here may we express a personal little "thank you" for these expressions of thoughtfulness which mean so much in a sometimes bewildering maze of daily occurences? For your kindness, for your sincerity, for your honesty, and for your valuable cooperation, in making possible the continuance of the Democrat. we who have daily striven to merit your approval, sincerely offer our gratitude, and pledge anew our best efforts toward furthering the principles of Democracy and covet the privilege of fostering your community projects, for the permanent and future development of Shelby County.

"I'm Going To Sit Right Down and Write Myself A Letter" is the name of a popular song—and after "wishing" MYSELF and OURSELVES a HAPPY BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY— Democratically speaking, I was reminded of the above title—but we now join a host of friends in extending our heartiest good wishes to Mrs. Nora Lester, who celebrated a birthday anniversary on Friday, April 3. "Lady Nora" states, the thoughtfulness of her friends and children, made the day one long to be remembered. The anniversary dinner was served at noon, the honoree graciously receiving the loving homage she so richly deserves.

And CONGRATULATIONS are again in order, and this time they wing their way into the home of our good friends, Mr. and Mrs Carl Groubie where there is now a "sweetest little feller", whom they have named JOSEPH AUGUSTUS GROUBIE! This helpless little "King of Hearts" has a name that sounds like a Roman Emperor—and judging from what his DAD has to say about him, we are prepared to meet one far mightier than—CAESAR himself!

There is apopular asnmldi

There is a popular and smiling official in the Courthouse whom we are always delighted to meet. He has a refreshingly optimistic manner that makes you like to be around him. On Friday, we were more than glad to welcome him into the Democrat office, for he brought from his home in Wilsonville a lovely collection of freshly cut Spring Flowers whose fragrant beauty made the office a happier place in which to work

Little Charles Swann, sturdy little Democrat mascot, now residing in Pell City, is spending the Easter holidays with Dr. and Mrs. James Crawford. Charles has already been in to pay his respects to the official force in the office, and assures us—that even though his residence is not in Columbiana—his citizenship will not be removed. He strongly advocates the DEMOCRAT, and "they" tell us he goes religiously to the Pell City post office for his paper each week and wags it home under his arm to have the news of his old home town read to him as soon as it arrives.

Answering the telephne 15 times on April 1st—only to be called an "APRIL FOOL". Being told four times that LEVERT CHRISTIAN—BANKER, wanted me to come to the Bank immediately on important business. Racing into the post office to get a package of "perishable flowers"—which proved to be an empty box (the very meanest thing any one could do—knowing how very essential FLOWERS are to my daily happiness)—convinces me that I am about the most gullible person in town. After all the "false leads" I have followed too on former occasins! However this Peter Pannish belief furnished amusement for the natives on the first day of April—and that's something—or is it?

One of the keenest delights we experience in the writer's craft is relating the successes of our fellow townsmen. We feel a keen personal pride in telling Rux Carter's many, many friends in Columbiana of the promotion which came this week to reward his excellent qualifications which fit him for the distinction. Should you travel to the Magic City you may find MR. CARTER now a prominent member of the official family of the State Highway Department. Across the miles we joni a host of well wishers for continued success and for happiness which always follows MERITED recognition. Mr. Carter richly deserves this note worthy achievement.

Mr. Clyde Sweatt, Columbiana, has completed his Course in Practical and Theoretical Rado and has been awarded his Diploma by the National Radio Institute of Washingon, D. C. He finished the prescribed Course of technical studies with creditable grades and is to be congratulated upon his achievement.

Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Pitts were hosts t otheir children, Mr. and Mrs. Ronda Pitts, of Birmingham, and Mr. and Mrs. Joe Davidson of Helena during the past week end.

COLUMBIANA LEADER

Since 1896 "Mr. Max" has conservatively served Shelby County and has owned and operated successfully th elargest store between Birmingham and Montgomery. His slogan "YOURS to Please—Max Lefkovits" is his "word of honor" that you will be PLEASED with the articles of wearing apparel in all the Departments he is offering for the Spring Season. He has combed the markets for some special Pre-Easter bargains, and we advise that you go by his store and look thru before completing your shopping list for Easter.

WALTON SERVICE STATION

Homer J. Walton's new business adventure has met with unprecedented success. Drive your car in the Standard Oil Service Station and fill the tank with the best gasoline on the market. The Mechanical Department is under the excellent supervision of Luther Curlee. Of course, you will want some new tires for the summer months. We recommend that you get some information on the ATLAS from the Walton Service Station before buying.

The many friends of Prin. E. H. Childs are delighted to see him out again after a rendevous with the unpleasant companion— King Flu. Mr. Childs was enthusiastically sponsoring a new plan devised at a recent meeting of the Board of Education for promoting the continuance of the High School.

W. D. "Uncle Doc" Bearden is still confined to his home, due to a bad dose of Flu.

We regret that the time limit prevented the presentation of the Gram mar School Operetta which we had hoped to present next week. Sickness and inclement weather was also a distressing factor in getting the large cast assembled for rehearsals —but to the "Kiddies" who so beautifully responded and conscientously attempted to learn their parts assigned, we offer a personal Thank You—and here's our promise. We will put on a creditable production when School opens in September! There it is—in black and white—and we do not make a promise we do not intend to keep.

LEST WE FORGET

19 years ago on last Monday, the United States entered the World War. Black and bleak headlines clouded the newspapers. Bugles blared—bands played— and young men stood in line to offer their lives for their country. Remember this background of the World's greatest tragedy? Factories were rushing out war materials—armies drilled—ships were sunk. In muddy trenches men awaited the zero hour—with only death and suffering abead. Sub marines with deadly torpedoes lurkedbeneath the sea's surface. Tanks rumbled over No Man's Land. Long weeks in hospitals. Influenza epidemic in 1918— and finally out of the horror of it all—ARMISTICE! Mentioned in passing—LEST WE FORGET!

Did you know that the Irene-Lou is the only shop in town which has not cmpletely forgotten the little MISS who wants a new frock for EASTER with a cunning hat to match, Just you take a look at that independent cute little June Fore and ask her where she purchased that Shirley Temple model she wears so charmingly. We took a special trip down to see these lovely little models, and we personally advise if you have a little "would-be" Shirley Temple in your home, you could not please her nor make her look more adorable than to purchase one of these cute little frcks—and allow her to join the Easter Parade!

No matter what kind of a dress you buy, you will not be well groomed IF your HAIR and FACE are not carefully thought about. Crinkles soon become wrinkles—Better stop at Louise's Beauty Salon, and check up on a Facial and get that long needed Permanent It makes all the difference in the way you feel—and look!

Are you Easter conscious? Emerson once said "The sense of being perfectly well dressed gives a feeling of inward tranquility which religion is powerless to bestow". We do not go quite this far, but we do advise that you will add to your dignity and pride if you are lucky enough to possess a new outfit. Look thru the ads appearing in the Democrat before making your final selection.

May the passing of each Anniversary bind us closer together in the cause we so proudly represent. Heart Drifts

ABSENCE

Funny how we jog along
Seein' folks each day;
Don't appreciate 'em somehow,
Till they go away.

Then there comes a feelin'
Sorter sad and blue;
Funny how the whole world changes
When I don't see you.

—(M. C.)

PARTING

They tell me if I dropped your hand
Walked on another road,
It would be a cobbled way—
I would not have a load.

I'd have a dress made of real silk,
Trimmed in a bit of lace;
I'd have my hair done all in curls,
And powder on my face.

My hands would soon grow soft and white,
My nails with pink would glow—
But that I'd be quite dead inside,
They do not seem to know.

—(V. C.)

THEY COULD NOT KNOW

I mingled with the crowds from year to year,
I loved them, revelled with them; bade them stay;
They could not know that silence lingers near
And kept me strangely terse to steal away.

We ate and drank, we danced; made life a play,
And when the music ceased, we called for more.
They could not know I gently stole away
And answered SILENCE knocking at my door.

—(Contributed.)

DISMISSAL

DREAMS may fade to ashes, dull and gray
Never fan the embers, go away;
Dying things are dreary, let them be
Leave the pain and torment all for me.

Lest a saddened parting, dim the last
Charm by which I hold you to our past
Draw the curtain softly, shut the door
Remember that I loved you—nothing more!

FOR YOU

There's no great honor I can win
For YOU!
No mighty work I can begin
For YOU!
No stirring drama can I write,
No canvas limn with colors bright,
Nor wondrous melody indite
For YOU!

But I can live a life thats strong,
For YOU!
Can cherish right and shun all wrong
For YOU!
And as each little task is done,
One ended and the next begun,
I live each day from sun to sun,
For YOU!

Lesson for April 12

JESUS TRIUMPHS OVER DEATH

LESSON TEXT—Luke 24:1-35.

GOLDEN TEXT—Because I live, ye shall live also.—John 14:19.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Glad Surprise.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus the Conqueror.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus Is Alive.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Our Living Lord.

The supreme test of Christianity is the fact of the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. It matters little what Jesus said and did while alive if his body remained in the grave. If he did not come forth in triumph from the tomb, then all his claims are false. On the other hand, if he did arise, all his claims are true. Fortunately, there is no better authenticated fact in all history than that of the resurrection of the body of Jesus Christ.

I. The Empty Sepulchre (vv. 1-3).

1. The coming of the women (v. 1). As an expression of affectionate regard for the Master, they came with spices for his body. This was a beautiful expression of sentiment but showed their lack of faith. If they had believed his words, they would have known that his body could not be found in the sepulchre.

2. What they found (vv. 2, 3). When they came to the sepulchre, they found the stone had been removed. How the stone was to be removed greatly perplexed them on their way, but on their arrival they discovered that their difficulty had already been met. They found the stone rolled away, but they found not the body of Jesus. For them to have found his body in the sepulchre would have been the world's greatest tragedy. The empty tomb spoke most eloquently of the deity and power of the Son of God (Rom. 1:4).

II. The Message of the Men in Shining Garments (vv. 4-8).

1. "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" (v. 5). This question has been reverberating through the centuries since it was uttered by the angels.

2. "He is not here, but is risen." Jesus had made all these matters quite plain. He had told them that the Lord must be betrayed and crucified and that on the third day he would arise again. If they had given heed to his words, they would have been relieved of their perplexities.

III. The Women Witnessing to the Eleven (vv. 9-11).

Their thrilling testimony concerning the empty tomb and the words of the angels appeared to the disciples as idle tales and they refused to believe:

IV. Peter Investigating (v. 12).

While the testimony of the women seemed as idle tales, Peter was not of the temperament to dismiss the matter from his mind. Therefore, he ran to the sepulchre. Upon close investigation he found the linen clothes lying in such a way as to prove the reality of the resurrection.

V. The Convinced Disciples (vv. 13-35.)

1. The walk of two discouraged disciples (vv. 13-15). Emmaus was seven and a half miles northwest of Jerusalem. Just why the disciples were walking this way we may not surely know. The topic of conversation as they walked miles northwest of Jerusalem. Just why the disciples were walking this way we may not surely know. The topic of conversation as they walked was the tragedy of the cross and the resurrection rumors. If they had believed what Jesus said about his coming forth from the grave, they would have expected to hear such reports.

2. The unrecognized companion (vv. 16-24).

a. Who he was (v. 16). While they reasoned together on the wonderful events of the past few days, Jesus joined them on the journey.

b. His question (v. 17). Perceiving their sadness and perplexity, he sought to help them by calling forth a statement of their grief. This question surprised them and caused them to jump at the conclusion that he was a stranger in Jerusalem, for the condemnation and crucifixion of the great Prophet of Nazareth were so recent and notorious that no one who had lived in Jerusalem could be ignorant of them.

3. The Scriptures opened (vv. 25-31).

a. His rebuke (vv. 25-30). He rebuked them not for their unbelief of the strange stories that they had heard, but for ignorance and lack of confidence in the Old Testament.

b. Jesus recognized (v. 31). While sitting at meat with the disciples their eyes were opened as they saw him bless the bread and distribute to them.

4. The effect upon the disciples (vv. 32-35). They were so filled with joy over this revelation of the Saviour that they hastened back to Jerusalem to tell the other disciples of his resurrection.

God's Love

God's love gives in such a way that it flows from a father's heart, the wellspring of all good. The heart of the giver makes the gift dear and precious; as among ourselves we say of even a trifling gift, "It comes from a hand we love," and look not so much at the gift as at the heart.—Luther.

Laugh From the Heart

A laugh to be joyous must flow from a joyous heart, for without kindness there can be no true joy.—Carlyle.

Cross Stitch Towels That Are Fun to Make

Pattern 787

Just a bit—but a telling bit—of decoration is all that's needed today to make our household linens smart. And so, simple cross stitch brings color and life to humble tea-towels which make dish doing a pleasure rather than a duty. These motifs of glassware and china—in cross stitch—are easy to embroider. This half dozen makes fine pick-up work, and also a grand prize for a bridge party—or most acceptable for a fair donation.

Smart Silk Prints for Young Girls

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

FOR as refreshing and lovely a threesome as ever fancy can picture, we suggest the alliance of springtime, youth and gay silk print. In the new season's style parade it is very evident that designers of young-girl fashions are all enthusiasm over joyous colorful printed silk crepes and silk taffetas.

Agreed that pretty young girls and happy bright prints belong together, the next logical step is to plan the wardrobe of Miss Sweet Sixteen and her younger sisters accordingly. To secure satisfaction in selection of a voguish silk print for the junior miss be sure that it be as practical as it is attractive. Meaning, one should choose from standpoint of wearability as well as intrigue of color and patterning. See to it that the silk you are buying is that sterling it will not pull at the seams or crumple because of artificial weighting. Only good silks can be depended upon to dry-clean like new, while many of them may be tubbed with perfect confidence in a happy outcome. Which accounts for an ever increasing demand for pure dye all-silk prints instead of shoddy weaves that make a grand "first appearance" and then begin to lose their glamor from the day they are worn. More and more women are coming to realize the economy of getting the best.

Printed silk crepe is a favorite for practical daytime wear. The key to silk prints for spring and summer is color in vivid, virile hues as inspired by Van Gogh, celebrated Spanish painter. Of course if pastels are your choice you will find them most delectable in the new showings, otherwise take a fling at high color this season and be smartly in fashion.

Silk crepe in red with white and black bubble print, as shown to the right in the illustration, lends itself admirably to the spring costuming of a young girl. The skirt of this chic outfit is pleated. Red buttons and a boutonniere animate the gray coat. The coat is extremely practical in that it can be worn as a separate wrap, and a high-style wrap it will be, for gray is a most talked of color. Gray shoes, gray hats, gray weaves, gray summer furs are made a feature in many fashion previews.

It is indeed a dainty silken frock which the smiling young miss to the left in the group is wearing. Tiny crossed golf clubs designfully pattern this simply tailored silk crepe frock. Novel patterning distinguishes the new silks. Most amusing and very smart are the silks with little animal figures, flying birds, music notes and the newest is vegetable prints with of course a comprehensive showing of florals. Tiny floweret print crepes are charming for little girls. White crochet buttons give an exclusive handmade touch to the cunning dress pictured.

Before the season is far spent every young girl will be coveting a bolero costume such as are outstandingly fashionable at present. So see to it that the young girl's wardrobe includes a bolero outfit to wear in the spring style parade. Prints made up in bolero fashion are a "last word" in swank. The model which the little lady seated in the foreground is wearing is made of printed taffeta. The blouse of French blue silk crepe is gathered to the skirt. The jacket is removable and the collar and cuffs of the blouse are worn outside. Notice the short puffed sleeves of the jacket. The jacket, either Eton, bolero or of basque with a peplum persuasion made of printed taffeta worn with a plain skirt is a high fashion for spring.

JACKET BLOUSE

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The blouse that looks like a jacket, made of gay print and worn with a monotone skirt for striking contrast, is a foremost fashion this season. Tailored, yet withal delightfully feminine, is the model pictured. It is made of a Sumatra cotton print and its tropical coloring is fascinating. The band-collar ends in a little tab tie. Similar banding finishes the full short puff sleeves. Wear the blouse tucked inside or out over the skirt—the new bolero suits call for the former.

Concealed Buttons

The coat with fly-front (buttons concealed under a stitched panel of cloth) is a new idea for spring. One particularly good model of this type comes in soft navy blue woolen.

Hunting Cap Hats

Hunting caps have given the inspiration for new Paris hats. They come in flat fur or velvet.

THREE-PIECE SUIT HOLDS HIGH PLACE

Because it is smart and practical, the three-piece suit has always held a high place in the feminine wardrobes. Outstanding in this mode is an attractive ensemble of soft wool in small checks of biege and wine red. Four patch pockets, cut on the bias, trim the tailored jacket which is styled with erect revers and a belt of wine red leather.

The knee-length overcoat is cut on swagger lines with mannish revers. With the ensemble is worn a red velour hat, wine and beige silk scarf and other accessories of wine red.

New Petit Point Luggage Recalls Old Carpet Bags

Reminiscent of the carpet bag our forefathers carried are the modern pieces of petit point luggage.

These bags, fashioned from petit point and leather, are light enough to please the airplane traveler and handsome enough to delight the most fastidious. Incidentally, a petit point make-up and overnight case harmonizes nicely with any other type of luggage.

You might keep this in mind the next time you start out to buy gifts.

Newest Type Shirtwaist to Wear With Spring Suit

While it contrives to maintain a skirtwaist aspect, the newest type to wear with the spring tailored suit, takes on beguilingly feminine lace edging and frills. Those with bosom fronts formed row-and-row of tiny frills or lace edging are favorites. They have youthful turnover collars either pleated or with round corners and lace-edged. The very latest in sleeves is the short puff with bandings of lace or pleated sheer.

Angel Robes

Some of the novelties featured in the fall openings in Paris were long monk's capes, angel robe evening gowns and floating Grecian draperies.

Newly Found Nerves Act as "Spares" to Speed Heart Action

Tests on Dogs Reveal Their Dual Function

NEW YORK.—Science's first step toward an understanding of recently discovered nerve fibers for speeding up heart action, a discovery which may lead to their identification as hitherto unknown sympathetic nerves, was announced to the New York Academy of Sciences here by Dr. Lucien A. Brouha of the University of Liege, Belgium.

Discovered at the University of Ghent in 1934 by Jourdan and Nowak, the tiny fibers have remained pretty much of a mystery to science, the only definite fact known about them being their position alongside the vagi nerves which run from the brain to the heart and which serve to retard the cardiac beat.

Even now, Doctor Brouha explained, little is known of their function in the normal body—but in dogs whose sympathetic nervous system has been removed, these new nerve fibers take its place. Indeed, so successfully do they substitute for the missing nerves that Doctor Brouha finds it absolutely impossible to distinguish a normal dog from one without its sympathetic system.

How Dogs React.

It was the ability of the new nerves to replace the sympathetic system in dogs that led Doctor Brouha to his conclusion concerning the possible function of the nerves as a substitute for the removed system. In the normal body, he believes, the nerves may aid heart regulation to a very small extent, although he said that in all probability they have additional functions as yet undiscovered by science.

In research leading to these results, Doctor Brouha conducted pioneer treadmill tests on dogs both before and after removal of the sympathetic system. The experiments were performed in co-operation with Dr. David B. Dill of the Harvard University Fatigue laboratory where Doctor Brouha is carrying on his investigations this year.

Outstanding among his finds were that the general behavior of a dog whose sympathetic chains have been removed remains normal, although the heart beat of the animal at rest is slightly less than normal, and that emotional excitement produces the usual definite cardiac acceleration.

Substitute for Regular Nerves.

Another important find was that the capacity to stand very intense exercise is not at all diminished three months after the removal operation, that time being necessary for the dog to recover from the operation.

Experimentally checking the possible influence of a rise in body temperature or muscular metobolism. Doctor Brouha found that they are definitely not responsible for the accelerated heart beat. Nor are adrenalin or sympathin, for with the removal of the sympathetic system, these hormones are not secreted into the blood stream.

10,000 Sterilizations in California

PASADENA.—Over 10,000 human sterilization operations—10,801, to be exact—have been performed in accordance with the California state sterilization law, E. S. Gosney, president of the Human Betterment Foundation here, announced after compiling the 1935 figures.

These operations, Mr. Gosney pointed out, were performed on inmates of state institutions since 1909. Neither the figures nor the California sterilization law have any connection with privately performed sterilization operations such as the one now figuring in the Ann Cooper Hewitt law suit.

Discussing the sterilization law for inmates of state institutions, Mr. Gosney said:

"The consistently careful administration of this measure in California is reflected by the fact that during the first six years of the enforcement of the law, sterilizations per year increased from 11 to 116; total 577; yearly average, 96. During the last 20 years they have gradually increased from 182 in 1916 to 870 in 1935.

New Sky Wanderer Found by Belgian

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—A tiny wanderer of the sky, now known only as an object, probably either a comet or minor planet, has been discovered by Prof. E. Delporte of the Royal Belgian observatory. Information regarding the discovery has been received by Harvard college observatory and distributed to the American observatories.

The object is so faint that only large telescopes can sight it. It is located somewhat west of the constellation of Leo.

X-Ray Burn Hazard Is Reduced by New Baffle Method

Cancer Treatment Enhanced by Increased Radiation

NEW YORK.—A new method of decreasing materially the dangerous X-ray burns which have long been a hazard in the treatment of cancer and other malignant growths by these piercing radiations was described before the meeting of the American Physical society here recently by Dr. G. Failla, physicist of New York.

One possibility of the new method is that better treatment of deep-seated cancers will be achieved, according to Doctor Failla, because the present limitation of the amount of radiation which can be given a patient is determined by the burning power of the rays on the skin. Any method to reduce the skin burning from X-rays will allow more potent radiation treatment.

Damaging Electrons Eliminated.

Doctor Failla, long known in this country for his basic contributions to medical X-ray therapy, told how he is now cutting out much of the secondary electrons which are an essential part of any X-ray beam. It is these charged particles of electricity which actually split apart the atoms of the skin and produce ionization in them. It is ionization which causes the skin reddening and damage even though seemingly adequate protection is afforded by heavy shields of lead.

The lead shield, Doctor Failla points out, protects other parts of the body than the point where the radiation is desired but, of necessity, the opening for the X-rays allows any electrons also in the beam to come through.

How New Method Works.

Doctor Failla's new method takes advantage of the fact that when electrons strike matter they are deflected at large angles. By setting up a system of baffles or stops a beam of X-rays containing only the desired gamma ray type of radiation can be attained. The deflected electrons are caught by the baffles.

"The advantage of the use of X-ray beams stripped of secondary electrons," said Doctor Failla, "is apparent in X-ray therapy, since the ionization in the skin is reduced."

Animal's Ears Are Best "Mikes" Scientists Find

PRINCETON.—Quantitative measurements on the ears of guinea pigs show the animal ear to be a far more effective microphone than those constructed mechanically, according to the announcement of Profs. Ernest G. Wever and Charles W. Bray, of the Princeton University Department of Psychology.

Small currents arising in the cochlea of the inner ear and measured on an oscillograph provide an accurate measurement of the response of the animal to sound, and the results of recent experiments show that the animal is capable of responding to tones of a wide range of frequencies, even though these tones be quite faint, whereas it is a well-known fact that mechanical microphones must sacrifice either sensitivity or range.

That this electrical method of measuring sound effect is accurate was determined several years ago when the small currents were amplified about half a million times and run into a telephone receiver. It was then possible for one person to talk to the animal and another person in a distant room not only to recognize the words but the voice of the speaker.

Find Sex Hormones Will Influence Eggs

WOODS HOLE, MASS. — Male sex glands of unhatched chicks were caused to develop decidedly female characters by injecting the female sex hormone substances theelin and theelol through the eggshells, in experiments reported before the meeting of the Genetics Society of America here. The research was carried on by Dr. B. H. Willier of the University of Rochester and Drs. T. F. Gallagher and F. C. Koch of the University of Chicago.

The theelin and theelol were injected in rather heavy quantities. From day to day, eggs were removed from the incubator, opened, and the developing embryos dissected. The ovaries of the chicks that would have grown up to be hens were not affected. Neither were the left sex glands of the chicks that might have been roosters. But the right sex glands developed, surrounding their characteristic male tissues, other tissues just as characteristically female.

Boys "Cry Babies" as Much as Girls

NEW YORK.—Little boys cry just as much as little girls.

So Dr. Catherine W. Brackett of the Child Development institute, here, has learned by timing the crying of pre-school youngsters.

Between the ages of eighteen months and four years, the average child spends 2.5 per cent of his days—or nights—crying. That makes an average crying time of 36 minutes a day.

Two Lovely Blouses That Will Give Your Suit That Feminine Appearance

Blouses have to go a long way toward giving the tailored and mannish suits a sweet and feminine appearance. The model at the top is a new lingerie blouse made of madonna blue crepe de chine and trimmed with tiny crystal buttons. Soft puff sleeves tightly banded and a fluffy bow at the throat contribute the feminine touches.

At the bottom is a most attractive shirt blouse—it has a charming Peter Pan collar and buttoned panel for the waist closing—the model is made of batiste with either short sports or long bishop sleeves.

Barbara Bell Pattern No. 1850-B—both blouses—is available in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20; 40 and 42. Corresponding bust measurements 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. The top blouse requires 1⅞ yards of 35 or 39-inch material for size 16 (34), and blouse (B) requires 1¾ yards or 2½ yards with long sleeves, size 16 (34).

Everything in the plant kingdom takes on new life. It is also the time when we should take on new life in the animal kingdom. May we, the Home Demonstration Clubs of Shelby County, extend to you Easter Greetings; with every wish for your health and happiness. May this be one joyous occasion. I wonder how many of us have ever thought how famous our food traditions are. Some of our traditions that are common to the different sections of the country are as follws:

Hot biscuit—who has not heard the Yankee express his delight with the famous hot biscuit of the Souh, together with the Southern hospitality? Boston will always be famous for its baked beans, and so will Maryland be known for its turkey and sour kraut. As you all know Southern Texas is famous for Mexcan Chili. From southern California we have the Avacado and Artichoke; from the north central states famous steak dishes.

The following are lines two hundred years old found in Old Chester Cathdral, England; called a "prayer":

Give me a good digestion, Lord,
And likewise something to digest,
Give me a healthy body, Lord,
With sense to keep it at its best.
Give me a healthy mind, good Lord,
To keep the good and pure ni sight
That seeing sin is not appalled,
But finds a way to make it right.
Give me a mind that is not bound,
That does not whimper, whine nor sigh,

Let me not worry overmuch
About the fussy thing called "I",
Give me a sense of humor, Lord,
Give me the grace to see a joke,
To find some happiness ni life,
And pass it on to other folk.

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

Would you, as a Boy Scout, "Be Prepared" to lead the American's Creed or The Pledge of Allegiance or settle some argument concerning The Flag, if some one should call on you at some sort of gathering where everyone was listening and expecting you to do as you were asked?

In my opinion, it would be one of the most embarrassing situations I know of for any real American citizen, and especially a Boy Scout not to be able to do any of the things previously mentioned.

This being the case, I think it would be well if all the Scouts in Shelby County would review The American's Creed, The Pledge of Allegiance, the proper respect due to The Flag and the History of The Flag.

Of course, it is understood that we should know these things already but it is best to be sure, to know what you are talking about. It would be one of the most unjust things one could do to give someone the wrong information concerning The Flag. So let's be sure of ourselves when we tell some one anything concerning The Representative of the United States of America.

Any number of times people have asked me such questions as: does the Pledge of Allegiance read; The Flag of the United States of America. Or is it just The Flag of the United States? How do you hang The Flag with the flag of another nation? and numbers of others too numerous to mention.

It is really embarrassing not to be able to answer things like these when you are supposed to know the answers and don't.

When you learn the answers to all the questions of The Flag it will be a pleasure instead of an embarrassment to have people come to you with their Flag questions. They will take your word for whatever you tell them, so don't mis-lead them and you will always have their confidence as one who knows His Flag.

It is really surprising to know just how little some people who are American Citizens by birth, know concerning the Flag.

Some time ago I was walking down the street in Birmingham. I believe it was George Washington's birthday that was being celebrated. At any rate there was quite a number of Flags on display. I turned down an avenue, and having just given the Siluria Scouts a Flag drill the night before, I realized there was something wrong with the Flags displayed above that avenue.

I mentioned the fact to a friend who happened to be with me. Our eyes began playing along the top of the buildings. We were not to be kept in our search long, however. I soon spotted the Flag that was out of place. (And was it out of place? It shouldn't have been on the streets at all)

I can't see how anyone could possibly make such a mistake. As you know; when displayed over the middle of the street, as between buildings, The Flag of the United States should be suspended vertically with the union to the north in east-and-west streets or the east in a north and south street.

Whoever placed this Flag here had placed it with union facing south On the other end of the same line there was a Flag that was placed in the right position. So you see, there was no excuse whatsoever for such a grave mistake.

Both the unions of these flags faced one another and stood out like a rotten spot on a banana, in my opinion (and many others, I know) it spoiled the looks of the entire block.

At the last Scout meeting, the Scouts wrote letters to Robert Adams, a Wilton Scout who is in the Childrens hospital in St. Louis.

The Bible reading contest which began April 1st, is progressing very well. A total of 800 points have been made by the Scouts.

Winston Hogan, Scribe.

Screw worms, one of the most dreadful livestock pests, have already been unofficially reported in a south Alabama county. Farmers are warned "not to ear-mark, castrate, or dehorn cattle in warm weather except when absolutely necessary."

SIXTH GRADE ENJOYS PICNIC

The Sixth Grade of Columbiana Grammar School was entertained on Friday with a very delightful picnic at the home of Mrs. F. B. Williams. Games of all kinds were played, after which a delicious picnic lunch was served.

And Oh! how surprised we were when we saw the lovely cake decorated with red and white and having the Sixth Grade written on it presented by Mrs. A. C. Walton. Everyone appreciated her thoughtfulness for our class members.

After eating so much lunch we were content to sit around and talk and the time came too quick for us to go back to our work.

We sincerely thank Miss Irene Bishop, Mrs. Walton, Mrs. Williams and all others who helped make our picnic a delightful one and we hope our grade can go on together thru High School and that we can have many more enjoyable times.

Joyce Jackson, Reporter.

A A A BROADENS BASE TO REACH MORE FARMERS

WASHINGTON—Changes intended to grant soil conservation benefits to more farmers were made in the farm program by the A. A. A.

The A A A said work on rates of payments for four regions was "progressing rapidly" and the schedule should be completed within a few days. Rates for the north central region were announced several days ago.

A primary modification of regulations made today would permit partial payments to producers who may not have the minimum acreages in soil conserving crops necessary to quality for full payments.

Previousy, it was announced that farmers, to be eligible for payments, must have, in 1936, at least 15 per cent as much crop and in soil conserving as in soil depleting crops. In the case of cotton, tobacco, peanuts and flax, the minimum was 20 per cent.

Under the new regulation, the A AA will make reductions from farmer's payments for each acre by which they fail to meet the requirements. The deduction rate will be be one and one-half times the rate of the soil conserving payments for each excess acre of soil depleting crops.

Another regulation, the AAA said would permit farmers, who already have large soil conserving acreages and small soil depleting acreages, to obtain soil building payments without reducing the amounts of their cash crops. However, heavy deductions will be made from the soil building payments if such farmers increase their acreages of soil depleting crops beyond an established base.

Acreage planted to winter cover crops and green manure crops after it has been in vegetables will be classified as soil conserving if the cover crops are plowed under as green manure between Jan. 1 and Oct. 1, 1936. However, the cover and manure crops must have been growing two months.

The AAA said this regulation would enable truck farmers to participate more widely in the conservation program.

17 Year Locusts To Appear This Spring

The 17 year locust is due to swarm over the eastern United States the latter part of May and the first of June, this year, They will appear in the Tennessee Valley and Sand Mountain areas of North Alabama.

Usually the insects do little damage, occasionally injuring young orchard trees which have been set out on new ground. These trees may be protected by covering them with mosquito netting or tobacco cloth until the locusts disappear.

The department of entomology at Auburn is anxious to get a complete record of this brood, and has asked that interested persons in the State keep a lookout for the insects.

No matter how large or how small the amount of liquor seized by a sheriff in the enforcement of Alabama's prohibition laws—whether it be a gill, half-pint, or a thousand gallons; he is entitled to the seizure fee of $3.00 provided by the Statute according to a recent ruling from the office of the Attorney General in Montgomery.

On April 1st this year, the veterans administration offices in Washington cleared their books of all indebtedness incurred during the war of 1812! The last widow of a soldier who fought 124 years ago has died. Records are therefore closed on this conflict. The last veteran of the Revolutionary War died in 1906—which constitutes the second War indebtedness that has been paid from the Federal treasury Carried forward in a big way are the wars with Mexico—Spanish-American War—and the World War.

The Alabama Legislature makes a perfect record of accomplishing exactly ZERO! The State is still in need of far reaching Legislative Acts pertaining to Health, Education and Relief. The two-thirds majority evidently "cramped the style" of the members in their non-compromising attitude—ending the hectic session in a Dog-Fall!

The Sheriff's office is one of incessant activity. Deputies going and coming—something "arresting" about this branch of the official family—and we found in making our rounds this week, that 24 stills had been captured and 12,000 gallons of mash destroyed. The stills were located in Beat 5, near Helena. The Jail Register shows 21 inmates who were charged with various violations. Two arrests were made for Public Drunkeness, three for violation of Prohibition laws, one for driving while intoxicated and one for issuing worthless checks.

Illinois Primary Results Interesting and Significant—New Tax Bill Drafted—President Roosevelt Favors Flood Control Projects.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

ILLINOIS' primary held the center of political interest for it not only provided lively state battles but also was of considerable moment nationally.

Frank Knox

Col. Frank Knox, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, and Senator Borah of Idaho, who was born in Illinois, were the contestants for the Republican Presidential preferential vote, and the former came out with 31 delegates against 26 for Borah. The senator's friends were elated because, without organization, he carried a large part of the state outside of Chicago. This preferential vote is purely advisory and neither man has a slate of delegates to the national convention. The result makes it certain that Knox will make a respectable showing on the first roll call. It also adds to Borah's prestige and aids him in the coming Ohio primary.

Gov. Henry Horner, seeking renomination, was victorious in the bitter fight with the regular Democratic organization and the Kelly-Nash machine in Chicago, which had thrown him overboard and supported Bundesen for governor. The Democrats almost unanimously voted for the renomination of Senator James Hamilton Lewis, and the Republicans named Former Senator Otis Glenn to oppose him in November.

Republican leaders in Washington were encouraged to believe the internecine warfare in the Democratic ranks would help the Republicans to carry the state. The Democratic sages, on the other hand, liked the showing of strength made by Borah, feeling his liberal following might switch to Roosevelt in November if the G. O. P. puts up a conservative candidate.

In Nebraska's primary only Borah's name was printed on the Republican preferential ballot but about one-sixth of the voters wrote in the name of Gov. Alf Landon of Kansas.

For the Democratic preference President Roosevelt was unopposed in both Illinois and Nebraska.

DEFEATING opposition by President Roosevelt's supporters, the state Democratic executive committee of Georgia ordered a Presidential preferential primary on June 3 and fixed the entrance fee for each candidate at $10,000.

"The New Deal has plenty of money to pay for a primary in Georgia and I am in favor of letting them do it," said Will Mann, close personal and political friend of Gov. Eugene Talmadge, administration critic.

The governor was asked directly whether he would oppose President Roosevelt in the primary.

"I don't know," he answered. "I am pretty busy with state affairs right now. It depends on how things shape up in the state."

HAVING discarded the President's suggestion of temporary processing taxes, Chairman Sam B. Hill's house subcommittee completed its draft of the new tax bill.

Sam B. Hill

It calls for a new type of corporation levy, ranging from 1 per cent to 29.7 per cent for corporations with net income up to $10,000, and from 4 to 42½ per cent for corporations with net income over $10,000, depending on the amount of earnings that are not distributed. Preferential tax treatment is given to banks and insurance companies, to debt-ridden companies, to companies in receivership, and a new system of taxing non-resident aliens is created.

Railroads will continue to have the right to file consolidated returns but the committee refused to accept the petition of R. V. Fletcher, general counsel for the Association of American Railroads, that railroads as a segregated group of industry, be given a variety of special deductions in computing taxable net income.

WITH appropriate ceremony the cornerstone of the new Interior department building in Washington was laid, the President handling the trowel. The structure, the second largest government office building there, is to be completed in December. It covers five and one-half acres and will provide 700,000 square feet of usable floor space. It will cost $12,000,000, about $5,000,000 less than the capital's largest, the Commerce department building.

The trowel used by Mr. Roosevelt was the one employed by George Washington in laying the cornerstone of the Capitol in 1793.

IN HIS press conference President Roosevelt said government departments are concentrating on flood control problems and that if congress would pass a bill appropriating a billion dollars for that purpose he would sign it, provided the measure put men to work immediately.

Mr. Roosevelt said the Passamaquoddy project in Maine and Florida ship canal were eliminated because of the recent refusal of congress to make appropriations for continuance of the work. He said he did not contemplate doling out relief funds for the projects and that there would be no funds for the projects unless congress reversed its refusal.

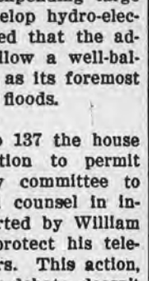
On the same day the United States Chamber of Commerce issued a warning against encroachment of the federal government on flood control projects which are the primary responsibility of the states.

The committee also objected to the New Deal policy of expending large sums for dams to develop hydro-electric power and declared that the administration should follow a well-balanced program having as its foremost purpose the control of floods.

BY A vote of 153 to 137 the house rejected a resolution to permit Senator Black's lobby committee to pay $10,000 to special counsel in injunction litigation started by William Randolph Hearst to protect his telegrams from the probers. This action, which followed a bitter debate, doesn't halt the work of the committee, which has its own funds, but it prevents the payment of more than $3,600 a year, in accordance with general law, to Crampton Harris of Birmingham, Ala., former law partner of Chairman Black.

The lobby committee in a recent session brought out the fact that some wealthy men who are backers of the American Liberty league also have contributed to the Southern Committee to Uphold the Constitution, though what this has to do with lobbying was not quite clear. The Southern committee, which is headed by John Henry Kirby of Houston, Texas, is opposed to some of the New Deal doings.

SUDDEN death, due to a coronary thrombosis, came to James M. Beck at his residence in Washington, and all informed Americans mourn the demise of this public spirited citizen and eminent authority on constitutional law. Though he was a sturdy and conscientious opponent of the present national administration, leading officials in Washington united with the Republicans in declaring that in his death the nation had sustained a great loss.



J. M. Beck

Mr. Beck was not only one of the foremost lawyers of America but for more than three decades was a public man of distinction, holding numerous offices at Washington, and an influential place in the counsels of the Republican party. Born in Philadelphia in 1861, he first held office as United States attorney for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, as a Democrat. He left that party on the silver issue and was made an assistant attorney general by President McKinley. In 1921 Mr. Harding appointed him solicitor general, an office which he filled with distinction. He then served three terms in congress, where he was one of the best debaters, and retired in 1934.

Richard Yates, former governor of Illinois and former congressman, died in Springfield at the age of seventy-five years. The son of the Civil war governor of the state, Mr. Yates was for many years a picturesque figure in Illinois politics and an influential member of the Republican party.

MUSSOLINI'S armies in Ethiopia occupied Dessye, an important military base, and captured vast stores of war materials. Marshal Badoglio at once started an expeditionary force along the excellent road from there to Addis Ababa, and it was believed the capital city would be captured within a few days.

Stiffened by military successes in Africa, the Italian delegation went to Geneva for peace conversations, prepared to demand a peace on Italy's terms, including virtual Italian control of the entire empire of Haile Selassie. Settlement of the matter within the framework of the League of Nations seemed remote if not impossible.

PLANS for mutual defense in case Germany attacks France or Belgium were studied by the general staffs of Great Britain, France and Belgium at a meeting in London. High officers of the armies, navies and air forces were present, with experts to assist them.

It was understood that a major feature of the plan would be to reply to any German attack with a terrific aerial bombardment by massed fleets on German industrial centers, railways, army headquarters, airdromes and seaports.

It was clear that the relatively small British professional army could not give a great deal of help against German aggression, and that Britain's effective aid would be rendered by her navy, which could easily seize control of the North sea and the channel, and her steadily increasing air forces.

BEFORE the senate subcommittee on labor appeared spokesmen for organized labor with charges that there is a great movement of machine guns, tear gas and police clubs into industrial centers for use in contending with strikes and attendant disorders. The first witness to tell the story of the arming of industrial plants for conflicts with labor was J. P. Harris, a steel worker from Portsmouth, Ohio. In support of his assertions came a mass of data compiled by the senate munitions investigating committee and presented at the hearing by Heber Blankenhorn, an employee of the national labor relations board.

At one point Harris testified that he knew the Wheeling Steel corporation at Portsmouth was "arming," a statement that brought from corporation officials at Portsmouth an assertion that company police were armed to protect property against "thieves and firebugs, and they will continue to be armed."

At another point in the hearing there was testimony that general "rumors" were being circulated that the Ford Motor company was "shot through" with spies, hired to report on the activities of labor.

ABOUT six hundred men and women, members of the recently organized Unemployed Workers' Alliance, staged a big parade of "hunger marchers" in Washington, shouting demands, singing and waving banners. They sought to present a petition to President Roosevelt in the White House but the best they could do was to obtain an audience from Secretary Marvin McIntyre for a delegation headed by David Lasser, president of the alliance.

Vice Pres. Garner

Lasser declared after spending 30 minutes with the President's secretary: "Mr. McIntyre gave us a lot of nice words, but nothing substantial. If nothing is done to give these people jobs there will be a hunger march on Washington next summer in which hundreds of thousands will take part. We are tired of Mr. Roosevelt's promissory notes."

Lasser and his delegation also called on Vice President Garner at the Capitol and got even less satisfaction from him.

"The jobless feel that we have been sold out by the Democratic party," Lasser declared.

"I resent that," snapped the Vice President, reddening. "I have been in politics for 40 years and I don't think anybody has ever been sold out by the party."

FOLLOWING a conference with Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood, who was removed from command of the Eighth corps area for criticizing WPA methods, President Roosevelt took the soldier back into his good graces and appointed him to the command of the Sixth corps area with headquarters in Chicago. He will replace Maj. Gen. Frank McCoy and the assignment takes effect May 2. General McCoy is transferred to the Second corps area at New York to succeed Maj. Gen. Dennis E. Nolan, who is retiring.

PLUTARCO ELIAS CALLES, former president of Mexico and for long the most powerful figure in that republic, was forcibly exiled to the United States, together with three other once prominent citizens, by the Mexican government, which declared their presence there was dangerous to the welfare of the country.

Summarily ousted with Calles, who for 11 years ruled Mexico with an iron hand, were Luis Morones, former minister of labor and leader of the regional confederation of workers and peasants; Luis de Leon, former minister of the interior and agriculture; and Rafael Melchor Ortega, former governor of Guanajuato.

The four men were, by order of President Cardenas, placed aboard a plane at Mexico City and taken across the border to Brownsville, Texas. From there they took another plane to California.

Leftists charged that Calles and his associates were fomenting agitation against the Cardenas administration. This Calles denied, adding: "A state of anarchy exists in Mexico and communism is spreading with government help."

SOMETHING new in Spanish history took place in Madrid. The parliament, by a vote of 238 to 5, ousted Niceto Alcala Zamora from the office of president of the republic. This action, accomplished by a coalition of Socialists, Communists, Left Republicans and ten minor groups, was taken on a Socialist motion that the president had acted illegally in dissolving the last parliament before the elections and that therefore he should be expelled from office. Back of this motion, however lay radical sentiment that Zamora, in using his power according to personal whim, has hampered the progress of the "republican revolution."

Diego Martinez Barrio, speaker of parliament, was made temporary president to serve until elections are held.

IN THEIR formal acceptances of the invitations of the United States government to the forthcoming Inter-American peace conference, three of the Latin American nations have proposed that a league of American nations be formed to preserve peace in the western hemisphere. The suggestion comes from Presidents Alfonso Lopez of Colombia, Jorge Ubico of Guatemala and Rafael Trujillo of the Dominican Republic.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

Washington.—A sharp boost in liquor taxes is being seriously considered by a considerable number of senators and members of the house. No concern whatever about what this may do to the legal liquor industry, or how it may blow the breath of life into what has been an apparently dying moonshine and bootleg industry is being manifested.

The whole reason for this new move is that the national legislators coming up for re-election this fall are afraid to vote the excise taxes recommended by President Roosevelt, and in addition find that the corporation tax plan suggested by the White House must be riddled with exemptions unless it is to play havoc with business.

Various different amounts of increase are being considered. Most popular, apparently, is the thought of boosting the tax on distilled liquor $1 a gallon, which would make it $3 on domestically produced liquor, and $5.50 on imported liquor. And along with this to boost the federal tax on beer from $5 to $6 a barrel.

Whereas, some time back, Federal Alcohol Administrator Joseph H. Choate, Jr., urged forcefully that even the present federal tax of $2 a gallon should be reduced in order to crush out the bootleg industry!

At that time Mr. Choate said: "As concerns liquor, the United States is living in a fool's paradise. We know that Prohibition's Frankenstein monster, the bootleg trade, is still with us, but we refuse to see its size and power. Particularly are we blind to the enormous growth of the main body of the monster, illicit distilling, compared to which smuggling and industrial alcohol diversion have been mere trifling excrescences on its gigantic frame."

Later in the same statement Mr. Choate recommended: "There should be such reduction in taxes and import duties as will enable the legal producers and importers to compete."

Import Duty Cut

Since that statement the reciprocal treaty with Canada resulted in reducing import duties on distilled liquors from all countries from $5 a gallon to $2.50 a gallon. But the federal tax on domestic liquor has remained unchanged (this is added to the tariff duty on imported liquor, of course), while actually the tax has increased in many states, due to a general tendency to increase local charges. Maryland, for instance, has added a small manufacturers' tax per gallon within the last few months.

Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, Jr., is not in sympathy with the move on Capitol Hill to boost liquor taxes. He thinks it might easily defeat the drive, hitherto fairly successful, of the enforcement agencies to break up the illegal traffic.

Representatives of the legal industry here are very much disturbed. They had been well pleased with Morgenthau's success in removing their illegal competitors, but fear that with the tremendous boosting in profits for moonshiners and bootleggers, which the threatened new tax would bring, their own business would suffer heavily.

As a matter of fact, some of the officials who have to do with enforcement tell the writer privately that they do not believe an increase in tax would put a single additional dollar into the treasury—that the shrinkage in legal sales would completely offset the additional tax per gallon.

The "buyers' strike" attitude of the public against any sharp price raise is cited. Also fear that it might become "smart" to know a bootlegger's phone number.

But the senators and representatives can't be worried about all this. They want to put through some sort of tax bill and go home.

Restore Excise Taxes

President Roosevelt will insist on the senate's restoring the excise taxes to take the place of the outlawed processing taxes—which he originally suggested for the new tax bill, but which the house ways and means committee has thrown overboard.

Present expectations are that he will get his way in the senate, despite the fact that individual senators are no more anxious to vote to impose taxes which may prove very unpopular in their states than are members of the house. But there are several reasons why the senate will yield to the President, and why the house will then yield to the senate.

One is rather obvious. The house has already indicated a determination to write in so many exemptions in the tax on undistributed earnings of corporations that it has become a joke as a revenue producer. In fact, it is pretty well agreed now that the present corporation income tax will have to be retained for this reason.

The other reason, and the one that will actuate the President in insisting on the acceptance of excise taxes, is much less obvious, but very clear once it is stated. It is simply that this is not the last tax bill. There must be another very shortly after election.

The point is that the present tax bill does not even aim at balancing the budget. It aims only at producing enough revenue to finance the additional cost of the immediate payment of the bonus, plus the lost—past, present and future—processing taxes.

Which puts the deficit, after this tax bill has passed and assuming it raises the required revenue, at a billion and a half for next year—the amount spent for relief in addition to what is held over from this year. Actually it will not even do that, for congress has been boosting appropriations over budget estimates all the way down the line.

Face Huge Deficit

When congress faces the budget situation next January, it will face a deficit of a very huge sum, even with the tax laws then operating. One part of it will be whatever the government figures it will spend the following year, beginning July 1, 1937, for relief. Another item will be about $45,000,000—interest on the debt to be incurred next year despite the increased tax bill. A third will be the increased appropriations, congress indicating no idea whatever of economizing.

This is why the President did not want to put all the new taxes on corporations this time. He wanted to leave a little fat for the next time. If he put it all on the corporations this time, before election, the Republicans might be able to scare the voters this fall by pointing out the certainty that another tax bill was coming, and make the point that next time the only place to get the money would be from the small income taxpayers.

As a matter of fact, Senator La Follette has been insisting for more than a year now that this is the logical place anyhow to get the additional money needed to run the government, so that it would not take much persuading by the critics of the New Deal to throw a general scare into a very large group of voters—a group large enough to swing most of the doubtful states.

Actually the President has no thought of recommending a tax boost for the smaller incomes. But some very shrewd people, including the very pro-New Deal senator from Wisconsin, believe that eventually the small income people will have to pay more.

Popular Game

"Button, button, who's got the button?" promises to become a favorite game in Washington. The District Supreme court solemnly holds, in the Hearst telegram suit, that it could enjoin the federal communications commission, but could not enjoin the senate, "another branch of the government."

This on the heels of the Supreme Court of the United States giving a tongue-lashing to officious and inquisitorial bureaucrats. In which, some folks here suspected, the six justices who concurred in the majority opinion had their tongues in their cheeks, talking about the securities and exchange commission, but thinking of the Black committee.

So the situation is something like this. Lower courts admit that they might have the power to protect an individual whose private telegrams were seized by the federal communications commission. But if the button were quickly passed on, so that by the time the individual attracted a court's attention some senate or house committee is scrutinizing the telegram, it's just too bad. Nothing can be done about it.

Of course the Hearst case, in which came this opinion by the District Supreme court, will be taken to the District Court of Appeals, and then to the Supreme court, so the present is not the final word, but as a matter of fact if a congressional committee's investigators once get their clutches on a telegram, or a letter, or a report, it doesn't make much difference what may be decided later by the courts.

Best evidence of this was the reading of William Randolph Hearst's telegram to James T. Williams, Jr., former editor of the Boston Transcript, and now Hearst editorial writer, on the floor of the house by Representative McSwain of South Carolina weeks before the decision of the court.

What Is Important

The fact that the telegram was read so publicly is not what is important in this situation. What is important is that when anything is seized by congressional investigators it is passed all over Capitol Hill for the interest of any member of the house or senate.

This Hearst telegram, for intance, was read by McSwain. He is not a member of the Black committee. He is not even a senator. He is a member of the house. Yet he obtained possession of the telegram.

Documents seized for congressional committees are always passed around. Always were, and always will be. The investigators, naturally, are political appointees. They are seeking to curry favor with the men who have the power to give them better jobs, to have their salaries raised, and to have them fired. So if one of them notes something which reflects on a senator's enemy, the senator is pretty apt to have a copy of the document pronto. If the investigator who notes the document or telegram or whatnot is not interested in the senator or representative who might be interested, he calls it to the attention of some other investigator who could ingratiate himself with that senator or representative. He knows the favor will be returned later.

Just an illustration. Nothing has been made public about it yet, but the federal communications commission now has a long telegram sent to big telephone company officials of one of the company's legislative agents in Missouri. This will make spicy reading when it comes out, and will embarrass the telephone company considerably.

"Now, look here, old fellow," said Geoffrey, "I'm not going to take any sides till I know where I am. I want to hear your story from first to last. Don't leave out any details. This show's bung full of detail, and details count."

I plucked at the grass.

"I don't know that I care to tell you."

"Take your time," said Geoffrey. "But we don't leave here till you do."

"I don't know that I want to leave here."

"No more do I," said Geoffrey. "It's a very attractive spot, and I'm glad of a change."

I lay back and stared at the sky.

I felt a curious detachment from all that ten hours ago had been my life. Looking back, I seemed to be looking across some unbridgeable depth.

I think the truth is that my interest in Helena Yorick had suddenly died, and since that had filled my being, for the moment my life was empty as never before. I did not regret the lady—I was neither happy nor sad. I simply had no material upon which my emotions could work. The bitterness I had shown Geoffrey was that of a savage critic—not of an injured man. I was impersonal.

So much for the state of mind which my abrupt disillusion had brought about. Helena Yorick had deceived me. Nell had looked into my eyes and fooled me to the top of my bent. The utterly impossible had happened. The ideal I had carved out of marble had crumbled away.

There was only one thing to be done—the game must go on and from now I would play my own hand.

I sat up and looked at my cousin.

"I suppose I may as well tell you," I said.

"I suppose so," said Geoffrey, yawning.

"Where shall I start?"

"From where I left you at Villach, just over a week ago."

A full half hour went by before I had done.

"I've got to digest this," he said. "I shan't be long."

While he strolled, I lay flat once more and stared at the sky, and though I would gladly have stopped them, my thoughts ramped back to the antics which I had lately performed.

Helena Yorick had piped, and I had danced. That was as much as it came to. But I had trusted the piper, and the piper had played me false.

My cousin was standing before me, regarding his watch.

"From what you tell me," he said, "the countryside appears to be littered with cars; our immediate vicinity, however, seems to have been neglected. We must, therefore, wait for Barley. He's a job of work to do and he won't be here for another hour and a half. Still, that'll give us time to settle two or three points. And between you and me, it's as well that you had that sleep, for unless I'm much mistaken, you won't have time for sleep for the next few hours.

"With regard to the promise Lady Helena gave to Pharaoh. . . . If you hadn't been overwrought, I like to believe that your reason would have told you that from every point of view that promise was no more binding than a bucket of Glauber's salt. For one thing, it was exacted—she promised under duress. For another, let's quote his own words. "Because you have scruples you are weighted clean out of this race. I am not so embarrassed—I never am." He makes that arresting statement, and then within five minutes he has the blasted effrontery to prove it up to the hilt. No wonder he left the room quickly; he was probably worried to death that Dewdrop would burst out laughing before he could get him outside. If you must have another reason, Pharaoh let you both go because he was stuck. As long as you two sat there, he could not move. More. The warden's suspicions were aroused and the house was full of your men; his only chance was to take up the role he asked for—the role of the Countess' guest.

"So much for the promise to Pharaoh. Now for the Count. He must, of course, be held till Pharaoh is dead. Barley's attending to that. Last night, at the Reaping Hook, he very properly held his tongue, but he knew just as well as you what a valuable prize you'd made. Like guest, like host, you know. In fact, to be honest, we'd been hoping to make it ourselves. You mustn't think we've been idle. We've watched and listened and learned a whale of a lot. And the Count's removal stood very high on our list. Well, as I say, Barley's attending to that. That's the job he's on now—shunting the Count.

"And now for you. I'm not going to labor the point, because you seem so sore, but I suppose you realize that you were—er—evacuated in order to save your life. I mean, you can't really believe that Pharaoh, if he can help it, is going to let you live."

"I haven't really thought about it," said I. "He's certainly tried to kill me and if he gets the chance I imagine he'll try again."

"Don't imagine," said Geoffrey. "Believe. Believe that he'll go on trying for the rest of his life. Your death-warrant was signed that morning at Annabel, 10 days ago. As long as you're useful, he'll use you—be sure of that. He meant to squeeze the Countess through you. But when he had got what he wanted, you were to die.

"And that brings us to her ladyship. This appears to be delicate ground, so I won't say much. But, if you please, ask yourself this. Why didn't she leave with you last night, as she did five nights ago? A possible answer is that she may have thought you'd prove mulish—jib at breaking her promise to the rottenest swine that ever took a girl by the throat. But the great probability is that she wanted to do a deal. She meant to see Pharaoh and ask him the price of your life. Thanks to Helena Yorick's efforts, you're still alive, though why she should bother about you is more than I can conceive.

"Now this is what I propose. As soon as Barley returns we make at once for Plumage and close down Bugle—not Rush. Rush is ripe for secession; rats leave a sinking ship. He may have something to tell us. If not, we proceed to the castle—complete with Rush. We use the tunnel and footbridge and Rush can unlock the doors. Then we get hold of the warden and put him wise. From him we can learn—"

And there he stopped dead, with his eyes on the foliage behind me and his pipe halfway to his mouth.

As I turned to follow his gaze, Sabre leaped out of the beechwood and over the brook.

For a moment the great dog nosed me, moving his tail, and then, before

"I Don't Know That I Want to Leave Here."

I could think, he was gone the way he had come.

I was just in time to see Sabre pass over a shoulder and flash out of view. Heavily I made for the spot. Somewhere beyond his point of disappearance Helena Yorick was moving, looking for me.

As first I could not see Sabre. Then I saw him leaving the valley to climb its opposite side. And then I saw his mistress, standing above in the sunlight, with one of her hands to her throat.

As I saw her she waved, and I answered. Then with one consent we began to go down to the valley that lay between.

Helena was regarding me straitly.

"Is this your greeting, John?"

I stood very still.

"Yes," I said. "I'm sorry."

I pulled out the note she had written and looked her full in the eyes.

"I know," she said. "I did it because I loved you."

I tore the note to pieces and let them fall.

"You've done that to my faith," I said.

"I see," said Helena, slowly. "'For whosoever will save his life shall lose it.'"

I shrugged my shoulders.

"I suppose so," I said. "I don't know. You're so much more clever than me. But something inside me's broken. I can't pretend."

"I know you can't, but I can. Every woman can. But I only pretended, John, to save your life."

"I know, I know," I said. "And I'm—much obliged. But I can't get as far as your motive. If I hadn't been mad about you, you couldn't have had me on."

Helena lifted her head.

"And so I'm damned," she said.

"I shouldn't think so," I said helplessly. "But it means we speak different tongues. Oh, can't you see what I mean? I thought it was I that induced the light in your eyes, but now you've shown me that you can switch it on."

"Is it any good my saying I can't? That when it came it was you that—brought it there?"

There was a little silence. At last she lifted her head.

"I can still care," she said slowly. "I have the power of being sorry—or glad. And I'm glad this has happened—thankful, and that's the truth. It's a jolt in a way, of course; but although we don't speak the same tongue, I think you'll get what I mean. It's very much better that this should have happened now than in six months' time. And now I'm going to speak plainly. Don't think I'm pleading my cause. That's not my way. Nothing on earth would induce me to marry you now. You're the one man on earth I can't marry—get hold of that. But I want to show you your trouble, because—well, I owe you something and perhaps one day it'll save you from making the same mistake.

"You're an idealist, John. That's one of the reasons why you appealed to me. I love idealists. I'm one myself. But idealists must live—and, what is still more important, they've got to let live. An idealist must be human, must keep his feet on the ground. If not, he becomes a nuisance—he carries his joke too far. You can't see that just now; you can't translate what I say; but I think you'll be able to one day, and then you'll remember my words.

"You 'can't get as far as my motive'—that's what you said. What you really mean is that you cannot see my motive, because you are looking too high; but my motive is natural and human and belongs to the earth. It's a pity you 'can't get as far,' for the motive counts.

"You see, if I had deceived you—and, of course, I don't deny that I did, I laid myself out to deceive you. I used every art that I knew—well, if I had deceived you with any shameful object . . . let's say to smooth my path to some other man, then your estimate would be true, for by using our understanding to let you down I should have committed a sin which not even an angel from heaven could ever forgive. But we both of us know that what I did I did because I loved you. And when you come down to earth, as I think you will, you'll see that that makes a difference. And something more you'll see, when you lower your eyes. You'll see what it cost me to do it. I debased our lovely coinage to save your life.

"Some people would call you a fool, but I know better than that. You see, I know you so well. You're so very simple and downright, and Honesty is your god. That worship and your unbridled idealism are, as it were, the lenses through which you see. And so what I did looks monstrous. . . . It's because of that that I'm neither angry nor hurt—only thankful. If you had weighed me and had dared to find me wanting. . . ."

Something was stirring within me. The challenge had stabbed some emotion that was not dead.

"Finish the sentence," I said. "That's just what I've done."

For a moment she regarded me curiously.

Then—

"No, you haven't," she said. "You think you have, but you haven't. If you could speak my language, you'd understand what I mean. But that's by the way. As I said just now, I—am—thankful that this has happened. . . . To be honest, I knew it might happen. I saw its shadow while I was writing that note. And I very nearly added: 'Don't let him know I've done this.' And then I thought 'No,' because that was a coward's way. I wasn't prepared to deceive you to save myself."

With a sudden air of pleasure she looked about.

"And now where's your cousin?" she said. "I fancy the game's nearly over. But I'd like him to hear my news and then we can settle the best way to go in and win."

As once before, the three of us sat on the turf, and Helena Yorick was speaking with my cousin's eyes on her face. But mine were upon the ground.

"If I had to give my story a title, I should call it 'How Pharaoh was hoist with his own petard.' But that would not be strictly correct, because, as you'll hear, it was the infallible Dewdrop that let him down.

"As John has told you, I saw him out of Yorick just about twenty past three. Then I went straight to bed, and after a little I managed to get to sleep. At half-past six I was awakened by the most awful din. Sabre was barking like mad and the fire-alarm of the castle was going all out. Then I heard men running and voices, and I'd hardly got my dressing gown round me before old Florin was speaking and knocking upon my door.

"Well, you'll never guess what had happened. A watchman had found blood on the terrace—a trail of blood that led him up to John's room."

She paused there and turned to me.

"I'd no idea that Dewdrop had stabbed you so deep."

I said nothing and at once she resumed her tale.

"The moment I heard the news I saw the infinite value of holding my tongue. I knew whose blood it was and why it was there, but I felt that, left to itself, that blood would cry out with an eloquence which I could never approach. Dewdrop had stirred up a regular hornets' nest; it seemed to me more than likely that with a very little direction the hornets would turn their attention to Pharaoh and him.

"I told the warden to rouse you and, if he could get no answer, to break down the door. Very wisely, you'd left this unbarred—I shouldn't have thought of that. Of course, your room was empty, but I went in myself and looked carefully around. You see, I was sure that you must have stanched the wound and I wanted to see if you'd left any traces of this. But, again, you'd been very careful. And so I was free to give the hornets a tip.

"I turned to the warden.

"'Where does this trail lead to?'

"Poor Florin stared.

"'But it leads to this chamber,' he said.

"'Nonsense,' said I. 'It leads from here. Some hurt has been done Mr. Spencer and he has been taken away.'

"The truth of the fiction was obvious. The hornets saw it at once. Four or five servants rushed off to study the end of the trail.

"'Who was aware,' I demanded, 'that Mr. Spencer was to be lodged in this room?'

Silk Prints and Chic Accessories

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

PRINTED silks headline the fabric story both for daytime and evening. Prints this season have an entirely new and refreshing look. New techniques and new patterns make current prints definitely 1936 and not carry-overs.

The latest treatment for daytime prints spaces tiny amusing motifs over the brackground. These miniature objects are frequently used instead of the dot theme. Animals are popular in patternings. Horses, and cunning dogs are decoratively delineated. Barnyard themes include roosters, tiny pigs, ducks and flying birds. Even fish and fowl have become print-conscious while butterflies dart over many of the modern silks.

As to flower prints, daytime florals are the most infinitesimal in years. Small bright florals spattered here and there, tiny bouquets and single flowers give silk prints a decidedly different look this season. Larger, more conspicuous flowers are reserved for afternoon and evening. Gorgeous florals on black, white or colored ground reflect exotic beauty.

The woman who diets will find the new vegetable and fruit prints quite to her liking. Radishes, carrots, beets, peppers, parsnips and tiny ears of corn thrive on silk crepe and silk shantung grounds. Fruit prints abound in the mode via apples, cherries, plums, strawberries and grapes in discreet and colorful patternings. The newer prints also inclure landscapes, newspapers, music notes, the alphabet and Roman numeral motifs.

Twin prints are news. Printed silk taffeta is combined with silk crepe in twin prints for jackets and redingote ensembles. Silk mousseline coats match the design of the printed silk crepe frocks worn under them.

When one dares to think of the novelty and chic of the new silk prints in the same breath with the novelty and chic of the accessories that will be worn with them the situation becomes positively exciting. For example, jewelers are playing up to the charming and beguiling eccentricities of the new silks by creating vegetable and fruit dress clips, bracelets, buckles and various other gadgets of colorful enamel and other composition, sometimes using bright stone settings to convey the idea.

Gloves too have entered into the conspiracy, coming out in colors to match the bright hues of the prints.

The very attractive young women pictured are, as one sees at a glance, thoroughly fashion-wise as to what is modish in silk prints and flattering accessories. The seated figure is wearing a gown made of a silk print that spaces miniature butterflies instead of the traditional dot. The three butterfly bows of starched lace down the front of the buttoned jacket-blouse together with white roses on her cunningly veiled sailor of lustrous straw give a sprightly touch. Take note of the well-bred version of the leg-o'-mutton sleeve.

The other high-brow lady has chosen one of the new pure silk vegetable prints for her gown. A beet is used as motif of the familiar polka-dot theme for her modish wine and white suit. A new and important detail is the flower treatment that places a carnation on each lapel of her tailored close-fitting jacket. The silk faille hat has a third carnation. The dress is a one-piece type.

GABARDINE SUIT

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The perfect tailoring of this distinguished suit is achieved by the use of fine wool gabardine which neither wrinkles or stretches and is never too heavy for comfort. The jacket is subtly fitted. It has two slash pockets set in at the sides. The straight cut skirt has the popular inverted pleat at center front, so that the skirt is amply full for walking but keeps a slim silhouette line.

To Match Prints

One of the new ideas that Paris is advancing is that of porcelain jewelry painted to match the printed dresses with which it is worn.

SPORTS-TYPE SILK FASHION HIGHLIGHT

In the realm of sports-type silks many newcomers are listed. Silk surah is a fashion highlight this season. Designers are using it in monotones, and in dotted or striped effects.

Silk shantung is also a great favorite. The printed silk shantungs are especially smart used alone or in combination with plain. White silk shantung is the chosen medium for many of the handsomest summer tailleurs shown. It tailors beautifully and launders to perfection.

Other sports-type silks include silk foulards, silk seersucker and striped silk crepe. White silk serge, silk pique, silk jersey, parachute silk, checked silk sailcloth, also plain or plaid silk crepe are of intriguing interest. It is well to familiarize oneself with these new silks, in order to buy intelligently and acquire clothes "you love to wear."

Use Discretion in Color Accents in Accessories

Colored gloves for spring are established, but the chic of this fashion lies in the discretion and taste with which the accent color is applied.

Browns, rust or chaudron, and blues are the best accent for gray. Red and rose are gayer but not as smart.

The new violine ranges are smart with blues, and with the marine blue of Molyneux, the cyclamen shades are extremely smart.

With browns, their own darker or lighter shades or the rose tones are excellent, and with black, all colors, and white. The cinnamon browns are particularly good with black and extremely smart.

Greens may be worn with gray and with blue, are excellent with brown, but are never worn with green.

There is something all wrong about accessories that match the gown, and conversely, the accent note of contrasting accessories is so very right.

Pleats Prominent

Pleats play a prominent role in spring fashions. Sleeves, bodices and skirts of day frocks are worked in fine pleats and evening gowns have insets of sunray pleating. Short fan-pleated capes top several evening frocks.

The Legislature Adjourns, Unmourned, Unhonored, Unsung.

There is no regret over the adjournment of the Legislature. Rather, everyone is glad that the special session is ended, five legislative days short of the allotted 30 days. After these weeks of wrangling, incertitude and inaction, it is a relief to have the Legislature off of our minds.

In the public mind the Legislature is unmourned, unhonored and unsung. There was never before in the history of Alabama a legislative session so marked by futility, frustration and ineffectuality. Though it sat for more than two months, it had to its credit when adjournment came only one positive accomplishment of any importance: it did finally pass a bill to provide for relief. And while this is something to be thankful for, belated though it was, the relief measure does not provide adequately for the needs, and its effects will be only temporary. The need for an effective, long-range relief program remains.

The Legislature does deserve credit for its steadfast stand gainst additional taxation. But this was a negative accomplishment. While defeating all efforts to impose new taxes, the Legislature did nothing instead to relieve the state's financial emergency. By its failure on the final day to submit a repeal referendum, it lost its last chance to redeem itself.

It is true that the subjects of economy and repeal were not included in the governor's call and that this placed legislation for retrenchment and for legalization and taxation of beer, wine and liquor under a great handicap. Yet a higher order of statesmanship might have overcome the difficulty imposed by the requirement of a two-thirds majority on subjects not included in the call.

APRIL DESIRE

"How can I stay indoors today?
Out there, through the woods, over the creek and down
A little hidden, unknown path,
A patch of violets is about to bloom.
I want to be there:
I want to kneel on the damp,
spongy earth,
To search with my fingers in the mould
For violet buds.
The little leaves, tiny and new,
Outline with red the back, bare branches;
And against the sky
The willow twigs gleam white,
There's something in the air today
That calls me out.
I want to exult with that little fish-hawk
Riding the cold, wet wind, still redolent of March.
I want to splash and dive with the wild ducks
Among the dead rushes and the blackened lily-pads.
I want to scream and dance; I thrill
To the swift urge and magic of bursting buds.
Oh, what a world of promise is outside!
"How can I stay indoors today?"

COLUMBIANA CHATTER

Mr. and Mrs. Max Lefkovits quietly celebrated their 35th wedding anniversary on Wednesday. "Mr. Max" and "Miss Dottie" are beloved by all who know them and are so long identified with the town and their home so long the center of true southern hospitality, their friendliness always so charmingly extended to their guests, that the entire County —had they known of the happy occasion, would join us in extending congratulations and best wishes for further golden years together filled with every happiness they both so richly deserve.

The dance sponsored by the American Legion, for which the Bama Skippers played on Friday night, was a success from a financial and melodic standpoint. Forty couples enjoyed the nights program offered and the writer especially congratulates the Skippers on their well balanced arrangement of instruments and on their vocalist—Fred Hardy—who should be training for RADIO. He has a natural radio quality in his pleasing Baritone voice—which should take him far.

We had the happy privilege of welcoming into our home on Sunday afternoon, some of Columbiana's former favorite citizens—namely, Miss Mamie Jo Harbin, Ex-County Health Nurse, who is now making an enviable record in Athens, Alabama, in the same work. George Richardson who formerly operated the linotype for the Democrat, is now making rapid strides in the newspaper work, and holding a responsible position with the Tuscaloosa News—Dick Ozley, also employed in Tuscaloosa with a prominent Furniture Company, states "George" has "bank ing hours"—but George insists he works hard enough while "at it" to make up for any shortage in hours —Carl Hildreth, another member of this "peppy", vivacious trio is a mem ber of the firm of Hildreth Job Printing Company, and from what we could gather from these young fellows, everybody and everything in Tuscaloosa is on the "up and up". We enjoyed their refreshing breezy chatter!

Mr. and Mrs. Mack Fancher of Selma, were week end guests of Judge and Mrs. Cage Head.

Mesdames Lena Merrell, Pinkie Jordan, Pearl Christian and Len C. Walker left Columbiana on Tuesday morning for an extensive automo bile tour including Washington, Lynchburg, Va., and New York.

The willow stick making connection with the little horse-hide pellet is now holding the spotlight for amusement in Columbiana. Those who do not leave for Birmingham where they can both hear and see, turn their business houses into reception rooms and gather around that little MIKE and hear Bull Connor as he yells in his own inimitable fashion O-U-T----!

Homer J. Walton, prominent young man about town was busily engaged this week receiving well earned congratulations from his legions of friends upon scoring the highest grade on an examination held in Birmingham last week which entitled him to First honors in the State as Funeral Director De Luxe. Now, if you LIVE in Columbiana, call by the Standard Oil Company's Station, and this versatile young fellow will sell you anything you want for your auto. Should you DIE in Columbiana, have some one else do the calling and this same young gentleman will see that you are "headed" just right as you embark on your last adventure. In other words, in LIFE or DEATH—HOMER J. WALTON will likely be glad to SEE or HEAR from you.

Nothing lightens labor like THOUGHTFULNESS and CONSIDERATION. So, we pause right here to pay a tribute to Horace Polk, George Neal and Powell Blair, three of our favorite co-workers, who heard us wishing for a radio table, Monday, on which to place our new Grunow. Presto—just like Cinderella, when we walked in Tuesday morning there it was—the artistic handiwork of the trio above named—and enameled in our "color scheme"—chinese red and black. Thanks a million boys—not only for the table which we need so badly, but for your spontaneous generosity and the thoughtful spirit which prompted the gift!

Friends of Mrs. Sam A. Lokey are delighted to learn that she has returned to her home, after having been ill in Birmingham for the past few weeks.

Little John Charles McGhee will celebrate his first birthday anniversary on next Saturday. A more popular little tyke could not be found. He is our neighbor and a very precious little friend whose refreshing baby chatter often brightens our pilgrimage to the office. We usually meet this little fellow as he starts out for his morning's walk. You should see him toddling down our way. He is the happiest babykin we know—but why shouldn't he be? Everybody in Five Points jumps the minute he orders it—even Grandpa McGhee—and what is more—they like it!

The Rev. Henry Hurst will return to Columbiana on Saturday and will fill his regular appointment in the Methodist Church on Sunday. He has been successfully assisting Dr. Arthur Nabors in a revival meeting in Florence, Alabama. Mrs. Hurst will return this week, after a two weeks visit with her daughter, Mrs. Bill Crutcher in Decatur.

The Clanton Wholesale Grocery Company were hosts to their Chain Store Managers and their families on last Wednesday night, entertaining with a Fish Fry at the Taylor Camp on Coosa River. About 50 members of the personnel of this popular Company attended. Among those from Columbiana, were, Mr. and Mrs. Mason Edwards and Jim Brasher of the Columbiana Cash Store.

Paul Edmondson, aged 8 years, son of Mr. and Mrs. Percy Edmondson, narrowly escaped serious injuries on Monday afternoon, when he ran into the truck driven by A. C. Carter. Mr. Carter did everything in his power to avoid the accident, but was unable to avert the collision. Mr. and Mrs. Mason Edwards rushed the child to Birmingham where X-ray examination revealed no serious injuries.

R. E. BOWDON, SR.

We acknowledge gratefully a personal call from our good friend and Ex-Editor of the Democrat, R. E. Bowdon, Sr., who is now efficiently serving fortunate patrons of the Calera post office, as Assistant Postmaster of this thriving little neighboring town. It was like "old times' greeting this loyal comrade who successfully travelled the journalistic trail with us patiently initiating us into the intricate mysteries of 'words and phrases,' when we began rather timidly to step into a sea of printers ink and swim around with a pen-point for a paddle. Well do we recall the many storms we weathered together—each member of the little crew remaining TRUE to the cause we so happily represented. A new SKIPPER now manns the personnel of that good old Ship of Democracy, but the same incentive for work and more work continues to make possible our coveted joy in "sailing" straight into the homes of our Shelby County citizens and friends throughout Alabama. Come again Mr. Postmaster Bowdon, there are none more sincerely welcomed into this little office than just Y-O-U!

THANKS!

We close Personal Mention page this week with a sincere and heartfelt expression of thanks to the many weeklies over Alabama which paid charitable tributes to our efforts to give you a creditable anniversary edition. Especially do we express our gratefulness to Cody Hall, one of the famous trio of Hall Brothers, whose editorial comment put a "song in our heart" and a more determined effort to deserve his generous praise. Comments in personal letters and paragraphs in the weekly editions make us renew our faith in—Santa Claus—There MUST be, after all—something REALLY fine and binding among the members of the Journalistic Fraternity. We have so often received favors from this interesting group of creative artists. Our only regret lies in not having had the privilege of meeting some of them and personally extending our hearts deepest gratitude for their kindness in allowing us to become a part of their excellent organization. Our lives have been made happier since realizing the brilliance of their comradeship across the miles that lie between our "desks"—and their thoughfulness of this novice has brightened the gloom of even the darkest days we have encountered. Again, Thanks A Million for You and You and You!

THE TVA had in its control 250 million dollars worth of property during the years 1934 and 1935, on which, according to its own annual report, it paid during the year 1935 a mere $16,900 in taxes.

The property of Alabama Power Company and of the Tennessee Electric Power Company equal about the same figure, namely, about 250 million dollars. During 1935 they paid 4½ million dollars out in taxes.

Utility Companies Pay 270 Times More Taxes Than TVA!

In other words, the utility companies paid taxes 270 times as great as the TVA on the same property valuation.

And yet the TVA claims that it pays taxes on the same basis as private companies. You don't have to be a college graduate to understand the error of that statement.

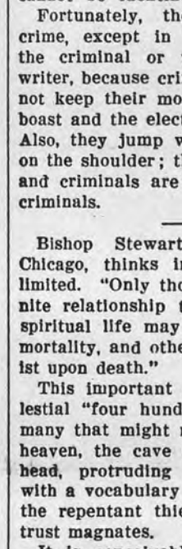
No Perfect Crime
A Heavenly 400
Fighting Over Rivers

President Roosevelt, in another "opening speech of the 1936 campaign," addressing 20,000 Young Democrats of Baltimore and the nation on the radio, suggested that youth should begin work at eighteen and "old age" stop work at sixty-five.



Arthur Brisbane

Youth should have its first 18 years, at least, for exercise, study, happiness. Sixty-five might be a good age to stop dull routine work for wages, but no man would want to stop real work until death, except that six months to look around this side of the grave might be acceptable. Goethe finished the second part of "Faust" when he was past seventy-two; and one of the ablest French writers, starting a new prose style, wrote nothing until at eighty-six he wrote the Life of St. Louis at the request of the king's widow. Within half a century 25 years have been added to the average lives of old men; nobody would want those years wasted.

In the murder of an unfortunate young woman, New York detectives think they see, at last, "the perfect crime," one in which the perpetrator cannot be identified.

Fortunately, there is no perfect crime, except in the imagination of the criminal or the detective story writer, because criminals are dull, cannot keep their mouths shut, are vain, boast and the electric chair gets them. Also, they jump when a hand is laid on the shoulder; that helps detectives, and criminals are betrayed by fellow criminals.

Bishop Stewart, Episcopalian, of Chicago, thinks immortality may be limited. "Only those who have a definite relationship to God through the spiritual life may be eligible for immortality, and other souls cease to exist upon death."

This important suggestion of a celestial "four hundred" will appeal to many that might not care to meet, in heaven, the cave man with low forehead, protruding jaw, the bushman with a vocabulary of 150 words, or all the repentant thieves, murderers and trust magnates.

It is conceivable that selection of the celestial few might be postponed a few million years, until real civilization shall have begun. This is the poison gas age.

Rivers have played an important part in the world's history and in wars. The Tigris and Euphrates, creating fertile Mesopotamia, and the ancient Nile, with its rich valley, regularly coated with Nile mud, made the first civilizations possible.

Men fought through the ages about those two rivers, and today rivers still cause war. In Europe the Rhine border may cause a repetition of the big war. In Africa, the Blue Nile, fed by Ethiopia's Lake Tana, breeds bitter hatred between England and Italy.

Charles Lamb tells of a Chinese gentleman whose house burned and of a pig so marvelously roasted that thereafter pigs were locked in houses, the houses burned for the sake of the roast pig.

That is recalled by a lady under arrest in Pensacola, Fla. Sheriff Gandy charges she tried twice to wreck a passenger train to kill her husband, the engineer. It is alleged that the plot failed because the wrong spikes were pulled from the rails. Sheriff Gandy thinks the lady wanted to collect $3,000 in life insurance.

An African savage who gave all his ivory tusks for a gun was found later in the bush, on his knees, praying to the gun not to shoot him. He did not know how to use it.

This country is equally ignorant about using youth and its enthusiasm.

A Frenchman says truly "American digestion would improve if Americans made more and better sauces."

Voltaire, another Frenchman, said the same thing of England long ago. He found that England had many religions and only one sauce, whereas France had many sauces and only one religion, and he preferred France.

The new Zeppelin, in spite of engines out of order on her return from Brazil to Germany, kept on her way at 50 miles an hour, fighting winds over the Mediterranean. That is one advantage of a dirigible—she stays up. The heavier-than-air plane with engine trouble comes down.

Russia has a genuine "youth movement," with one-third of all workers under twenty-three years of age, 43 per cent of them girls. Russia has 173,000,000 population, nearly half of it born since the Bolshevist revolution.

Populations and history change rapidly. Extreme youth might control the whole of Russia but for the fact that it is already controlled by Stalin, of middle age.

Floyd Gibbons ADVENTURERS' CLUB

Hello, Everybody!

"Twelve Stories Up"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter.

GOING up! Take the next car, please! It's an indoor aviator who's come to tell us his tale of woe today—Distinguished Adventurer Edward T. McCrann, one of the best doggone elevator pilots that ever answered a buzzer.

Ed jumps around almost as fast as that elevator he used to drive. When I first heard from him he was living in New Haven, Conn. Two weeks later, when I had occasion to communicate with him he had moved to Washington, D. C.

It's five years since Ed has run an elevator, and he still remembers it as one of the most monotonous jobs he ever had. It was just the same old trip, from morning to night. The same old buzzer ringing and the same people getting on and off in the same old building in Hartford. Only once did anything out of the ordinary occur—but Ed admits that that occurrence relieved the job of all of its monotony for a few minutes.

It happened about 7 o'clock on a June evening in 1929. Nearly all the tenants were out of the building. The superintendent came up from the basement and started looking over the elevator. He said there might be something wrong with it because he had heard a rasping sound in the shaft that shouldn't have been there.

Elevator Man Goes Up on Top of His Car.

One look at the top told the story. Some workmen had been doing a job on the inside of the shaft. They had strung a wire to furnish them with light, and had left it behind when they finished. That wire tangled with the main cable, way up at the top, just where the cable came out of the heavy grate that supported the motor. The super asked Ed if he'd ride up on the top of the elevator to the top of the shaft and unfasten that maverick wire.

Ed was just a high school kid then. He was lean and active, and the job didn't look any great shakes to him. He consented readily. After all, it was something to break the monotony of that everlasting up and down trip. The super got into the car and dropped it down below the door level. Ed climbed on top, and up they went to the top of the shaft, just above the twelfth story.

The super ran the car slowly as they neared the top. When it got close enough so that Ed could reach the dangling wire he yelled, and the super stopped the car. The car halted just even with the twelfth floor. Ed reached up and began untangling the wire.

The superintendent opened the car door and stepped out onto the twelfth floor. "Hey, Ed," he called, "I'm going down the hall for a screw driver. I'll be right back."

Ed yelled, "All right," and went on with his work. The wire was fastened a little higher than he'd thought. He grabbed the grating under the motor and lifted himself up.

His toes were barely touching the top of the car and he was straining his free arm to reach the end of the wire when he heard someone enter the elevator below him. Thinking it was the superintendent he paid no attention. He made another lunge toward the wire—caught it.

And then, to his consternation, the motor began to whine and the car dropped away from under him, leaving Ed in a panic, clinging to the iron grating with both hands.

By the time Ed's presence of mind came back to him the elevator was halfway down the shaft. He started to yell, but he was so close to the motor that he couldn't be heard above its noise. The elevator went clear to the bottom and stopped. The door clanged open and someone walked out. Then everything was quiet except for Ed's cries. What had happened? Could it be possible that the superintendent had forgotten all about him? Ed yelled again. The sound echoed hollowly in the long shaft. Then silence—the dead, eerie silence of an empty building. And Ed hanging by his fingers 12 stories above the ground.

"The seconds," he says, "seemed like years. Try as I might I couldn't get my mind to working. It was racing like mad trying to figure a way out, but it never found one. There just wasn't any.

"The grating was greasy and I could feel my fingers slipping—slipping. Suddenly I heard steps in the hall and yelled again. It was the superintendent coming back with the tools. He must have guessed what had happened when he heard me and saw the elevator door was closed. He yelled something to me but I was so scared I couldn't make out what he was saying. My fingers slipped a little more. Then I heard him racing down the stairs."

Superintendent and Elevator to the Rescue!

Again Ed's fingers slipped. He tried to hang on with one hand while he got a fresh hold with the other—and almost lost his grip altogether. It seemed like years—seemed as though he was holding on with nothing but his fingernails, when finally he heard the elevator start upward and knew that if he could hang on just a moment longer he'd be safe.

"There were tears in my eyes," he says, "as that car came shooting up toward me. My body was covered with sweat, and I can't say if it was cold sweat or hot. My hands slipped again as the car came on.

"I didn't have the courage to look down—didn't know how close the elevator was—when at last, my clawing fingers lost their hold on the grate. I shut my eyes as I started falling. A prayer ran through my mind and—."

And then Ed came to a stop with a thud—safe on the top of the car, about six feet from where he had started.

When Ed got off the top of that elevator cab he was limp as a rag. It wasn't until next day that he found a solution to the mystery of the moving elevator. A doctor on the twelfth floor came out in a hurry and, seeing the cab without an operator, ran it down himself.

He had heard Ed yell, he said, but paid no attention to it. "And if you could feel one hundredth of the horror I felt as I hung in that dark shaft," says Ed, "you'd realize why I shiver just a little bit, even now, when somebody mentions that doctor's name."

Success

It is said that a man can successfully lie with his eyes, but not with his mouth. The face is such an index of character that the very growth of the latter can be traced upon the former, and most of the successive lines that carve the furrowed face of age out of the smooth outline of childhood are engraved directly or indirectly by mind. There is no beautifier of the face like a beautiful spirit. The want of mind lowers all the powers of the body; but so does an evil and debased mind which is still more wonderful. —Brian Brown.

Find Castaway

A Robinson Crusoe was discovered by the crew of the French windjammer Tolosa, on Rinca island, 100 miles north of the Strait of Magellan, South America. He was clothed in goat skins and uttered guttural cries, though he led them to a natural spring when they indicated they wanted water. The man appeared to be of Nordic stock, either Scandinavian or German, or possibly British. He is considered to be a shipwrecked sailor who has lost the power of speech, probably through never having spoken to a soul for many years.

Lesson for April 26

JESUS LOOKS AT WEALTH AND POVERTY

LESSON TEXT—Luke 16:19-31.
GOLDEN TEXT—The rich and poor meet together: the Lord is the maker of them all.—Proverbs 22:2.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus' Story of a Beggar Man.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Which Was the Rich Man?
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—What Money Cannot Buy.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—How Can We Make Our Social Order Christian?

The topic as given by the Lesson committee is hardly a fair statement. The supreme message is the presentation of contrasted lives and destinies as expressed through the accidents of wealth and poverty. Lazarus was not entitled to heaven because he was poor, neither did the rich man reach the place of torment because he was rich. In this lesson two worlds are unveiled before us, disclosing extremes of character and conditions of persons. In this world we see a rich man reveling in luxury and a poor man in sore affliction begging at the rich man's gate. In the other world we see the same men in reversed positions. These lives were intended to be representive.

I. The Contrasted Lives (vv. 19-21).

1. The rich man (v. 19). He seeems to have lived in a mansion secluded from the common people. He was clothed in costly raiment. He was served the richest food that could be provided. His sin was selfishly to indulge his appetites without consideration for others.

2. The beggar (vv. 20, 21). He was laid at the rich man's gate with the hope of getting at least the crumbs from his table. The rich man gave him no consideration. The dogs of the street were more kind to him than the rich man. Though destitute and helpless, the man's name is most suggestive. "Lazarus" means "God is a help," indicating that a godly life shone through his poverty. Worldly condition is not a sure test of a man's position in the sight of God. All rich men are not wicked and selfish, neither are all poor men godly.

II. Their Contrasted Deaths and Burials (v. 22).

1. The beggar. He was found dead and his body was hurried off to a pauper's grave. No notice was taken of his death by the world. Doubtless the only loss to the world was that he was no longer to be seen at the rich man's gate.

2. The rich man. He also died. His gold could not bribe the messenger of death. Doubtless a costly funeral was held, attended by those who moved in his social class, the officiating priest pronouncing great eulogies over him.

III. Their Contrasted Destinies (v. 23).

1. The beggar. He was at once carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom. Te souls of believers are especially cared for at the hour of death (Phil. 1:23). They go immediately to be with the Lord.

2. The rich man. Though he had an elaborate burial, he lifted up his eyes in hell being in torment. When the veil of futurity is lifted, we see the positions of these men are reversed. The poor man is in the company of just men made perfect because of his life of godliness on the earth, and the rich man is stripped of his purple and fine linen and cast into hell with all wicked men, because while on earth he lived only for selfish ends.

IV. The Reality and Fixedness of Life Beyond the Grave (vv. 24-31).

1. The cry for mercy (v. 24). Dives, which is the Latin name for "rich man," was now willing to claim relationship to Abraham. He was keenly conscious and the appetites which controlled him while on earth were still with him. Part of the torment of hell will be the cravings of appetite and lust with no means of their gratification.

2. Abraham's reply (v. 25). This reply cast the matter back upon the man's memory. He said, "Son, remember." The lashings of a guilty conscience will be most real in hell.

3. Their fixedness. Human destinies are fixed during this life. When one passes out of this life he enters into a condition unchangeable.

4. God's Word is the all-sufficient light (vv. 27-31). Dives now requested that Lazarus go on an errand of mercy to his brethren. He regarded the testimony of a spirit of more value than the Word of God. Many today are more willing to trust the rappings of a ghost than the sure Word of God. Abraham declared that God's Word is sufficient, that those who rejected Moses and the prophets would not repent though visited by one who had risen from the dead.

Hope

Every blade of grass, each leaf, each separate floret and petal, is an inscription speaking of Hope. Consider the grasses and the oaks, the swallows, the sweet blue butterfly—they are one and all a sign and token showing before our eyes earth made into life.—R. Jeffries.

Our Face Values

We stamp our own value upon ourselves, and cannot expect to pass for more.—Marden

All Around the House

You can't kill plant lice with a poison. You must dose them with some kind of liquid that will smother them to death. Kerosene emulsion or tobacco dust will do this.

Do not add dressing to a salad until just before salad is to be served. If salad greens are allowed to stand in dressing for any length of time, they will wilt.

Cold roast beef toughens if cooked for any length of time in hot gravy. It is better to heat gravy and pour over the meat when ready to serve.

When serving lettuce be sure that no water is on the leaves when french dressing is added. The water will spoil the dressing and the oil will not adhere to the lettuce. Do not put dressing on lettuce until it is to be served.

When papering a room cut off the left-hand selvage on rolls before you begin to paste. Leave right-hand selvage uncut. The overlapping method of papering is far easier than trying to place two edges together.

To make frosting adhere to a cake, dust a little flour over the top of the cake and you will have no difficulty in making the frosting stick.

Gelatin for fruit desserts should be whipped until the consistency of whipped cream, thick enough to prevent fruit settling to bottom of mold.

• • •

Soap improves with keeping, so when the stores offer sales of soap, it is economy to buy a quantity of it if you are able to store it in a cool, dry place.

Indian Snake Charmer Uses a Mysterious Poison Herb

Kurbad Ali, an Indian, has a contract with a medical institute to supply them with cobras, the poison of which is used for experiments. To secure his victims he employs a mysterious herb used from time immemorial by Indian snake charmers. The herb exudes an odor which does not affect human beings, but temporarily stupefies snakes, rendering them harmless.

Prehistoric Bones Found in Southern California

Bits of bone have furnished scientists with evidence that man may have roamed southern California in the glacial epoch—nearly 25,000 years ago. Prehistoric remains of an imperial elephant, largest of all land mammals, and what appeared to be a human being were unearthed by WPA workers, digging 12 feet below the surface of the Slauson avenue drain, Los Angeles. In a closely assembled group were fragments of tusks, two teeth, and parts of a large vertebra. Near by were smaller bones, including a skull.

THOS. H. MAXWELL FOR CONGRESS

THOS. H. MAXWELL of Tuscaloosa, Ala., Route 1 candidate for Congressman from the Sixth District, composed of Chilton, Bibb, Greene, Hale, Perry, Shelby, Sumter and Tuscaloosa Counties, is a Veteran of two wars.

PLATFORM

I am not on a privately owned corporation or state payroll and am backed by no Clique or ring.

I favor such legislation that the farmer receive more than cost for his products, that he spend money and thus aid all other vocations. Such is the main objective of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Therefore, let us have:

1. Collective bargaining for the organized farmer and organized industrial labor.
2. The thirty hour week in manufacturing to distribute the opportunities lessened by labor saving machinery.
3. Pensions paid wholly by the Federal Government, administered by states, of $30.00 per month to all persons of sixty or more years, whose incomes are less than $1,000.00 per year, which plank the gray haired, young and middle aged should support.
4. Federal loans at one-half of one per cent per annum to sovereign states for use in their schools, liquidating borrowed indebtedness, and for other purposes.
5. Erosion control for soil conservation.
6. Flood control with incidental conservation of power to be used in country homes.
7. A sufficiency of Constitutional money for conducting the nation's business without borrowing.

Pass this word by letter or post card or phone to the counties:

Bibb, Chilton, Greene, Hale, Perry Shelby, Sumter, Tucsaloosa, that every farm voter rally to polls on May 5th, 1936, rain or shine to elect their man while the other citizens are willing to vote for him. This is the splendid opportunity for Congress by properly applying the best of Constitutions can make the people happy and panicless.

Sincerely,

THOMAS H. MAXWELL,

(Paid pol. adv. by Thos. H. Maxwell, Tuscaloosa, Ala., Rt. 1)

POLITICS—Local and State, hold the spotlight this week as Candidates are stepping in double quick time in an endeavor to reach their ambitious goals. It has been interesting to listen to various comments made for and against the aspirants to these important positions. We sincerely hope in voting, your personal prejudice will not over shadow your better judgment in placing your YES or NO! We personally hope the BEST MAN WINS!

SHERIFF'S OFFICE

Weston Lee is one of the most affable and courteous officers we deal with in our weekly ramble thru the corridors of the Courthouse. He is never "too busy" to assist us in our eternal pursuit of NEWS, and as he is one of the most active Deputies in Claude Fore's excellent army of coworkers, we usually find out just what has been done in this busy office without wasting any body's perfectly good time—and believe it or not—Columbiana is a busy place. If there is anyone not in a hurry—we haven't found 'em yet! WHY?—Well, that's still a debatable and unsolved question! However, the Sheriffs report this week is plenty active!

On Sunday night Elgin Posey (colored) was killed by Boston Keith following a quarrel in Sherman Wallace's home in Harpersville. Fore and White investigated and Boston Keith was placed in jail, but was released Monday— the Grand Jury finding no bill.

The Grand Jury called to meet on Monday, April 27, for the investigation of all jail cases, completed their deliberations on Monday afternoon. After considering all cases, they returned 9 indictments charging Felonies. Six of these cases were disposed of immediately after the report of the Grand Jury, leaving only three jail cases to be tried at the May Jury term of the Circuit Court.

YELLOW FRONT PASSES SECOND YEAR OF SERVICE

The Yellow Front Store in Columbiana is one of the most satisfactory stores in the town in which to do your trading. About two years ago, this branch of the Sumter Farm & Stock Company Stores, opened its doors for business, and located in the down town business section as our next door neighbors. Naturally, we watched with a great deal of pride their growth and development. Today, under the excellent leadership of Manager G. C. Glass, the Yellow Front Store stands foremost in this community for courteously and efficiently serving its large patronage which extends throughout Shelby County.

The quality of merchandise which you buy in this trading center is dependable. The price for groceries or ready-to-wear will meet the requirements of any family budget. The Democrat offers congratulations to the owners of the Yellow Front Store for the merited success they now enjoy, and to Manager Glass for his tactful, courteous service which has been a large factor in making this company a successful business adventure in Columbiana. In passing the second anniversary of the "Yellow Front", in the business circle of Columbiana's progressive commercial District, we wish for this company many more prosperous years in our midst.

The South's Verdict

"THE JURY UNANIMOUSLY RECOMMENDS THAT SOUTHERNERS SUPPORT HOME INDUSTRIES TO GIVE MORE EMPLOYMENT AND KEEP MONEY IN CIRCULATION AT HOME"
AMERICAN NITRATES
SOUTHERN TEXTILES

Should we purchase goods made in the South, when they are just as cheap and just as good as foreign products, or should we send our money out of the country?

Leading Southerners have given their verdict on this important matter in a booklet being distributed by the Agricultural Development Bureau of The Barrett Company. Speaking of the movement started a year ago by Dr. Charles H. Herty, when he made a plea to support home industries, the Bureau's State Supervisor says that all Southerners "have an unique opportunity to contribute to their own prosperity and that of the entire South by supporting this movement."

Many men prominent in the affairs of the State are quoted, and the weight of their combined opinion should make itself widely felt.

COMMENCEMENT AT VINCENT

Commencement exercises at Vincent High School begin Friday night May 8th, with the presentation of the Senior Class pay. A three-act drama. "The Mill of the Gods," is the play selected this year. The commencement sermon will be delivered at the high school Sunday May 10th. Class night and graduation exercises will come Monday, May 11, at which time 25 seniors will receive their diplomas.

Credit Associations Lending More Money

Production credit associations thru out the United States loaned farmers over $66,000,000 during the first three months of 1936, the largest amount in any similar period since the organizations were started.

Eight of the associations for making crop and livestock loans are located at Bay Minette, Ozark, Auburn Anniston, Huntsville, Russellville, Demopolis and Montgomery in Alabama.

Kiddies' Kolumn

—:o:—

Eden, Ala.,
April 24, 1936

Dear Mildred White Wallace:-

I have thought ever since I moved away from Columbiana I would write a letter to the Kiddie Kolumn, but every time I get my pencil and paper and start writing, Bettie is sure to come tnd take my pencil away from me. Oh, you just don't know how a little sister can worry a big boy like me.

I enjoy the Democrat each week, even though I don't get to read it first as Mother thinks she should be first.

I like my new home fine—have a large yard to play in. I don't quite understand why Bunnie doesn't live close enough for me to run away and go see her.

I am soon going to be three years old. I have received the Democrat every week since I was a wee baby, and I want to personally thank you for your kindness.

You see boys and girls, I am very proud to have the honor of being the Democrat's little Mascot. I send my love to all my friends.

With love,
Charles Swann, Jr.

I like my teacher very much. Her name is Mrs. Lewis Blackerby. Miss Alice Nolen is my spelling teacher. I like her too. Our school will be out Friday. I sure do hate it. I wanted to be promoted. I haven't made anything but A's and B's.

Hope my letter misses the waste basket.

Dear Mildred White Wallace:-

I am a little girl ten years of age. I am in the third grade.

My teacher's name is Miss Alice Nolen. I like her very much. She sure is good to me.

My favorite studies are spelling and arithmetic.

My best playmates are Dortha Mae Mae Alexander, Bernice Isbell, and Annie Maude Armstrong.

The mountains are beautiful now. The flowers are blooming and the trees have begun to leave out. There are two tunnels through the mountains.

I hope to see my letter in the paper.

Your little friend,
Eveline Glass.

$37,000,000 IN CROP LOANS AVAILABLE TO FARMERS

PRESIDENT RAISES CROP LOAN TO OUR FARMERS SEVEN MILLION DOLLARS

Good news for farmers was contained in the recent disclosure that the President has raised the $30,000,000 crop loan fund to $37,000,000. These loans, which are now available, are limited to the borrower's immediate needs and, in all cases, to $200 per person. Interest will be charged at 5 1-2% and the loan will constitute a first lien on the crop financed by it.

The loan regulations contain two features which all farmers should heed, regardless of whether or not they are borrowers. Applicants must plant a garden for home use. Although the soundness of this is widely recognized, there are still far too many farmers who buy for cash what they could grow at home.

Along the same lines, the regulations suggest that American made supplies be used. Just as when a farmer has a home garden he keeps his money at home, when he buys goods made in America he keeps money circulating at home where it can do him further good. All the farm equipment and fertilizer the farmer needs is now made in America, and much of it is made right in the South. In suggesting that these domestic materials be used, Uncle Sam is pointing out a sound economic principle.

PETE JARMAN VISITS HALE COUNTY AND GREENSBORO

Pete Jarman, candidate for Congress from this district, spent a short while in Greensboro last Saturday. He says he has covered much of Hale county, and hopes to see all the voters before the campaign closed. Pete is highly elated at the reception he received wherever he goes in the district. Since the 1st of March," Mr. Jarman said, "I have had a leave of absence without pay from my job in Montgomery and have devoted the time to canvassing." Hale county will give him a large majority in the primary to be held on the 5th of May.—The Greensboro Watchman, April 23rd.

Heart Drifts

DESIGN

If I could choose my own design
For happiness today,
I'd only seek, small child of mine,
To make your hours gay.

But since there's work that I must do,
I only press your hand,
And kiss you on both round pink cheeks;
And hope you understand!

—(Helen Welshimer)

SONG FOR YOU

I want to make a song for you,
A tender little song for you—
That tells you how I long for you,
Beloved—.

The little song would cling to you,
And dear, sweet memories bring to you
But oh, I cannot sing to you
Beloved—.

For when I strive to wake for you
The melodies that ache for you—
It seems my heart will break for you
Beloved—.

—(H. M.)

BEAUTY FOUND IN SIMPLE THINGS

She works in her garden, living quietly,
Watching the way of wind in the plumes of cane,
And mangoes ripening in the sun, and rain
Trailing coolly in from an open sea.

And the earth has taught her wisdom, and the way
To peace through beauty found in simple things;
For God is hers in a flower, in curving wings.
Or a child's clinging hands at close of day.

—J. Coffin.

PERVERSE

I will not make a single bed,
I shall not sweep a floor,
And I'll put on my old blue hat
And walk right out the door.

Let humdrum folk who cannot see,
Do just such tasks as these,
For April flaunts her witchery,
And I'll do as I please.

A golden sun is shining down,
And little winds at play,
And all the buttercups are out,
In glad and gold array.

And straight I seek a little path,
Which I know all too well,
And by its rough and tumbled way.
It leads me out of Hell.

—(A. N. H.)

CONCEALMENT

I've learned to do my tasks quite well,
At least the people say.
My gingerbread is fairly light,
My music sweet and gay.

I call on shut-ins and I go
To dinner and to shows;
I laugh—oh, much more frequently--
I'm sure nobody knows.

That now and then at people's teas
I almost drop my cup,
Because I am afraid I'll see
Your face when I look up.

—(H. W.)

RAIN

Only the mist, only the rain
In the lonely gloom of this haunted lane
Is it only the rain that sobs and sings?
(It could be the ghost of so many things)
O magic lost! Come back again
In the mist, in the rain.

Stiewer to Be Keynoter for Republicans—Flood Control Bill Passes Senate—Battle Over New Tax Bill in House.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

WHEN the Republicans gather in national convention at Cleveland next June their keynote for their Presidential campaign will be sounded by Frederick Stiewer, the eloquent and handsome United States senator from Oregon. He was selected to be temporary chairman of the convention by unanimous vote of the arrangements committee of the national committee after due consideration had been given the names of several other prominent Republicans.

Senator Stiewer

Observers held that the motive in picking Stiewer was a desire of the party leaders to give the convention a western atmosphere at the start, with an especial eye to agriculture. The senator has been actively identified with wheat growing and his home town, Portland, is a center of the northwestern battleground of the November elections. His colleague is Senator Charles L. McNary, one of the authors of the old McNary-Haugen agriculture bill and by many regarded as a possible dark horse in the Presidential nomination race. Governor Landon said he was glad to hear Stiewer had been chosen, and it was believed Senator Borah also approved, for in many ways Stiewer has proved himself liberal, and at the same time has upheld the Constitution and the American form of government.

He has opposed most of the New Deal measures, but has not been uncompromising, as he voted for such acts as the TVA extension, the labor disputes act, and the AAA amendments. He has been active in soldier legislation, including the bonus. He opposed the work relief bill, the utilities bill, the tax bill and the Guffey coal bill.

Congressman Bertrand Snell of New York, minority leader in the house, was selected to be permanent chairman of the convention, a position he held in the convention of 1932.

DISREGARDING warnings by Senator Vandenberg of Michigan against too hasty action, the senate passed a bill introduced by Senator Overton of Louisiana authorizing the expenditure of $272,000,000 for flood control work on the lower Mississippi river and its tributaries. There was no record vote. The bill has no relation to the omnibus flood control measure now pending, which may reach a billion. The sum named in the senate bill is authorized merely to be appropriated and will have to be put in a deficiency appropriation bill. Senator Overton declared it was justified by emergency conditions.

In addition to the 272 million dollars there is authorized an appropriation of 15 millions to be allocated by the secretary of war and used in rescue work or repair and maintenance of flood control works.

FEDERAL JUDGE HALSTED L. RITTER of Florida was found guilty on impeachment charges by the senate and removed from office, being the fourth federal jurist to be ousted in this manner. On each of the first six articles of impeachment a majority of senators voted for his acquittal; but on the seventh article, which was a generalized summary of the charges against him, he was convicted by a vote of 56 to 28.

H. L. Ritter

An order declaring Ritter should be "forever disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States" was defeated, 76 to 0.

The senate's verdict in the twelfth impeachment case brought before it as a high court of impeachment since foundation of the American republic amounted to a decision that Judge Ritter had violated the Constitutional requirements of good behavior in office. It carried no punishment other than automatic removal from the bench.

THE administration's bill to levy about 800 million dollars in new taxes yearly was introduced in the house by the ways and means committee, and a fierce battle started immediately. The Republican minority of the committee issued a report which stated that the proposed tax law was "unsound in principle, will undermine business stability, is another step toward regimentation of all business, and is not designed to raise revenue but admittedly is another New Deal experiment."

Conservative Democrats joined with the Republicans in this attack against the bill, but the administration leaders were confident the measure would pass before May 1.

Complete revision of the corporation tax system is the main objective of the bill. It levies a graduated tax on corporation income, based on percentage of earnings withheld from distribution to stockholders in the form of dividends.

The majority report asserted the measure would raise about $803,000,000 the first year, but admitted that over a three-year period revenue would fall $334,000,000 short of the President's budget-balancing program. It was added that the deficit could be acted on "more intelligently" next session.

SENATOR KENNETH McKELLAR of Tennessee made an attempt to reduce by $225,000 the appropriation for the federal bureau of investigation, otherwise J. Edgar Hoover's G-men, and failed ignominously. Only McKellar and one other senator were in the affirmative on a viva voce vote, and in the brief but lively debate several Democrats, including Majority Leader Joe Robinson, joined Senator Vandenberg in denouncing the proposed reduction. The Michigan man's remarks were caustic. Said he:

"I will go as far as the senator from Tennessee in all matters of economy, but it seems to me that this is a peculiar place to start economizing. The bureau says it needs 175 more men. If the senator wants to save 175 men, I will join him in taking that number from the 18,235 employed by Doctor Tugwell's resettlement administration. I will join him in abolishing 175 of the 43,641 jobs under Mr. Hopkins. I will join him in removing that number from the 19,548 jobs under the HOLC, or the 2,422 jobs under the long interred NRA."

SEVEN persons were indicted by a federal grand jury in St. Paul, Minn., for the kidnaping of William Hamm, Jr., brewer, in June, 1933. Some of the accused are already in prison. Only one, Alvin Karpis, public enemy No. 1, is still at large, and the Department of Justice in Washington has offered a reward of $5,000 for information leading to his apprehension.

OCCUPATION of Addis Ababa and all of Ethiopia was the price demanded by Italy for an armistice in East Africa when the council of the League of Nations met again in Geneva. Baron Pompeo Aloisi presented the ultimatum on behalf of Dictator Mussolini. Wolde Mariam, representing Ethiopia, countered with a request that the league invoke all penalties against Italy under article 16 of the covenant, these including military sanctions as well as the economic penalties which the league has been trying to enforce. The British and French delegates explained the stand of their respective governments in the embroglio.

Baron Aloisi

The league was helpless, and having received the discouraging report of the conciliation committee, was compelled to confess it could not find means of attaining peace. France will not consent to the imposition of military sanctions, and Great Britain naturally will not undertake to enforce them by herself. It appeared the poor Ethiopians were to be abandoned to their fate, meaning the extinction of their empire and their exploitation by Italy.

Anthony Eden in his address to the council warned France that she might expect from Great Britain no further support against aggression by Germany than France had given against Italy.

From the north, south and west the Italian armies were advancing on Addis Ababa, and the panic stricken civilian inhabitants of the capital were fleeing from the city. Foreigners sought shelter in the bomb-proofed British legation. The mayor issued all the arms available and the government called on all able men to make a last stand for liberty, saying "it is better to die than to be enslaved."

Latest dispatches said the Ethiopians were blasting the road between Dessye and Addis Ababa, and that the advance of some of the Italian columns had been halted by strong attacks. The emperor was afield with his troops and turned the government at the capital over to Crown Prince Asfa Wosan.

THAT old gold mine at Moose River, Nova Scotia, provided an epic tale of unselfish and heroic human endeavor that will be told for many a year. For ten days more than a hundred experienced miners strove unceasingly to rescue three men who had been trapped by the fall of dirt and rocks in the 140-foot level of the abandoned mine they were inspecting. Machinery and other equipment were brought from far away. A diamond drill was driven through and through this small opening, communication was established and food was dropped down but already one of the three was dead of hunger and exhaustion. Finally the desperate efforts of the rescuers were successful and the two survivors were brought safely to the surface, together with the body of the dead man. Those saved were Dr. D. E. Robertson, famous and beloved surgeon of Toronto, and C. A. Scadding. The one who did not live was Herman Magill, also of Toronto.

SECRETARY OF LABOR PERKINS reported that employment in manufacturing and nonmanufacturing industries during March showed a gain of 250,000. One division of the steel industry, she reported, had increased its employment above the 1929 level.

Pay rolls in the industries surveyed by the Labor department were $10,000,000 above February and $20,000,000 over a year ago.

The employment index in the wire making division of the steel industry, she said, now stands at 143, compared with 124.2 in 1929. At the same time she pointed out that four and a half million young people have come on the labor market since 1929 and that employment would have to rise to 125 per cent of the "normal" level to absorb these newcomers.

Sixty-six of the manufacturing industries reported gains, she said, and 11 of the 16 nonmanufacturing industries showed improvement in employment.

GOV. ED. C. JOHNSON of Colorado is determined to keep "cheap labor" out of his state and has taken steps to stop the invaders at the boundary lines by means of a military patrol of the National Guard.

Col. Neil W. Kimball, adjutant general, flew over western Oklahoma on a scouting expedition following reports workers were gathering for a concentrated "border run."

Guard officers said workers were camped across the state line in Oklahoma. Reports that indigents were evading the patrol along the New Mexico line by turning eastward sent patrol units hurrying to the Kansas boundary.

ANOTHER post-war treaty has gone flooey. President Kemal Ataturk of Turkey and his cabinet decided that the Dardanelles must be remilitarized, despite the Lusanne pact, and Turkish troops were promptly moved into the zone along the 75-mile long strait that connects the Sea of Marmora and the Aegean sea. It is believed Kemal will soon rebuild the fortifications in the zone which the allies failed to capture during the World war.

President Kemal

The Turkish dictator didn't surprise anyone by his action, for he asked permission of the League of Nations some time ago to rearm the Dardanelles. No formal reply had been made, but the British government rather favored giving consent, and the Soviet union openly approves Turkey's move. Italy was displeased, and there was considerable excitement in the Balkan states, especially Bulgaria which borders on European Turkey. The Bulgarians renewed their demand for a corridor giving them a direct route to the Aegean sea.

Probably Kemal's action will not be severely condemned by anyone, for most of the European nations are preparing for war with feverish haste. Austria's army, small but well equipped, held a spring parade in Vienna, and immediately the nations of the little entente displayed their anger at this show of military force and their military attaches in the Austrian capital were ordered not to occupy the places reserved for them among the reviewing officials. Rumania has increased its military budget to $88,000,000 and created a special fund of $20,000,000 for the development of aviation. Hungary is clamoring for revision of the Trianon treaty and recovery of the territory it lost to the little entente.

LOUIS McHENRY HOWE, secretary to President Roosevelt and for many years his close friend and adviser, died in the Naval hospital at Washington after an illness of more than a year. Mr. Howe was known in the capital as "the President maker," for it was largely due to his efforts that Mr. Roosevelt reached the White House. For twenty-five years, from the day when Mr. Roosevelt and he first met in Albany, he had devoted himself to forwarding his friend's political fortunes. During the Chicago convention and the ensuing campaign his planning and his advice were credited largely with the results attained.

DISPATCHES from Chengtu, China, tell a terrible story of the famine and drouth in Szechuen province, once one of the most fertile regions in the country. It is said to be the worst famine in the history of China, the deaths numbering many thousands and fully 30,000,000 persons being in distress. Suicides and "mercy slayings" are everyday incidents.

Officials said the situation primarily was a result of Communist incursions during the last two years in which the reds overran and pillaged the land.

WHAT American newspaper publishers think of the actions of the Black lobby committee was expressed forcibly and unequivocally in resolutions adopted by their national association at its annual meeting in New York. The committee was accused of having violated the first, fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution by its seizures of private communications, and the publishers recommended that all victims of the committee's acts seek civil damages and demand the "prosecution of all involved in the odious affair under the criminal statutes of the United States."

OTTORINO RESPIGHI, one of the most famous of modern Italian composers, died in Rome at the age of fifty-six of heart disease following blood poisoning. His passing is cause for deep mourning among music lovers everywhere.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

FAMOUS WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington.—Capitol Hill is simply amazed at the falling off in mail from constituents lately. Many offices of senators and representatives are right now receiving less than 10 per cent of their normal mail.

In the face of the fact that a sweeping new tax bill is being written, to be imposed on the country, this situation is absolutely unique.

The answer, according to some old-timers, is that the people back home do not understand what is going on. For one thing, most people who have been reading the newspapers about the new tax bill assume that the whole thing is aimed at the big rich corporations, particularly the ones with big surpluses. One senator told the writer that he had inquired in his own home town—he happens to come from a very small city—and had discovered that not a single business man in town thought the new tax bill would hit him!

"The only people who are interested," he continued, "are stockholders in some corporations, and more of them are pleased than alarmed. They think the new law will force their corporations to pay bigger dividends, and they are all for that."

But the really amazing fact appears to be that owners of little corporations are convinced, without knowing anything about it, that they will be exempt—that only the big fellows will bear the new burden. And this does not make them very angry.

Whereas, senators point out, the committee program in the house provides a whole schedule of new taxes for corporations with incomes ranging from $10,000 a year downward, as well as from $10,000 a year upward.

Have Wrong View

Most of these owners of small corporations read the original press stories about the new tax plan—that President Roosevelt wanted to eliminate the present corporation income tax, the present corporation capital stock tax, and the present excess profits tax, and substitute this sliding scale tax on undistributed earnings for all of them.

They still hold that view, despite the obvious fact that congress has no intention whatever of repealing the corporation income tax, and may even retain, in whole or in part, the capital stock and excess profits taxes.

In short, the effect of the new bill, when completed, will be to add the new taxes to the old, not to substitute the new for the old, as the President recommended. Nor is there any doubt that the President will accept the changes. Nothing else will provide the revenue the government must have, especially as congress is determined to go as lightly as possible on excise taxes.

With respect to little corporations—those with "adjusted net incomes" of $10,000 or less—there is a sliding scale tax in the house committee plan which goes up to 29.7 per cent on all undistributed earnings. Quite a sizable slice out of earnings which a struggling little corporation might be anxious to use in building itself up!

So the little corporation is far from exempt!

Sliding scale taxes in the committee plan for corporations with incomes from $10,000 a year up—and this includes a very great many corporations in small towns which are not regarded, even at home, as anything but little fellows—rise much more sharply. These slide up to 42½ per cent on all undistributed earnings in excess of 57½ per cent of the net income.

It is true that there are several classifications on which the burden is eased—railroads, banks, corporations with debt obligations requiring the discharge of a certain part of the debt every years, etc. But the owners of little corporations who think that their smallness is going to prove an umbrella are due for a very rude awakening.

Tariff on Textiles

Bearing in mind the important part that the closing of so many New England textile mills, due allegedly at least to a flood of imports of Japanese textiles, played in the Rhode Island congressional election last year, (a sweeping Republican victory), Republican members of the house ways and means committee will write a very politically minded minority report against the new tax bill.

One of its features will be the suggestion of new excise tariff taxes, particularly on textiles. These would follow the pattern of the so-called excise, but really tariff, taxes imposed several years ago on oil, copper, coal and lumber.

The minority report will stress, of course, the thought that new taxes would not be necessary if the government would only curb its spending, and devote its attention to finding ways to save money instead of searching for new methods of extracting money from taxpayers. It will lay great stress on the idea that every dollar so taken from a taxpayer is a dollar which otherwise would be spent by the taxpayer in some way or other, and hence would play its part in providing employment. This in turn, it will be pointed out, would lighten the burden for relief and boondoggling now bearing so heavily on the federal and local governments.

The idea of an import excise tax on textiles, instead of a tax on corporations' undistributed earnings, is expected to make a big hit in New England, New York and New Jersey, and will be calculated to cause a little discontent with the Democratic program in the Southern textile section, particularly in the Carolinas.

Incidentally, if any strength should develop for it, the proposal will be most embarrassing to Secretary of State Cordell Hull, who is still enthusiastic about his reciprocal trade agreements, and is gradually hammering down the protective tariff wall by this system. Many casual readers overlook the point that every time Hull agrees to a reduction in a duty on a given product in a treaty with one country, that reduction promptly applies also in favor of every other country with which the United States has a "most favored nation clause" treaty. And that means most of them.

Appeal to Farmers

For example, when in the recent treaty with Canada the duty on imported liquor was reduced from $5 to $2.50 a gallon, the same reduction promptly applied to Scotch and Irish whiskies.

With a view to appealing to the farm belt, the Republican ways and means committee members will recommend heavy excise tariff duties on agricultural products of all sorts. This is aimed at offsetting the appeal of the New Deal's AAA farm benefits, now changed to soil erosion payments.

This phase of the report—while no attention will be paid to it by the Democratic majority—is expected to prove rather embarrassing to Democratic house members. For the majority members of the ways and means committee have agreed that there are to be no excise taxes whatever in the bill, despite the fact that President Roosevelt and the Treasury department have insisted there should be.

Of course the President and the treasury contemplated very different excise taxes from those the Republican ways and means members will recommend. They were thinking of something more like the AAA processing taxes.

Incidentally, the prospect still remains that when the tax bill becomes law it will contain this type of taxes. Not in the form in which it passes the house, but in the senate draft, and in the final conference agreement which will be signed by the President.

Quoddy Project

Passamaquoddy may get a new dress and become not only respectable, but an actual asset to the New Deal.

Having pulled a couple of rabbits out of the Maine hat in the last two weeks, Roosevelt and Farley would surprise nobody in Washington if they adopted a suggestion from the Navy department. It is simply to abandon Quoddy as a large electric producing plant, and convert it into a naval base!

Enough power could be produced by the tides to justify—in political arguments, at any rate—the original claims about harnessing the tides. There is plenty of water there, it is pointed out, and of sufficient depth to produce a good harbor, providing a couple of breakwaters are built.

But the big argument in favor of it is that such a naval base would be at the nearest point in the United States to Europe! It is almost two days' sail closer to Europe than New York, and one day's sail closer than Boston.

It is also argued that the tremendous 40-foot tide would greatly simplify the dry-dock problem—would make, with some comparatively simple construction, a natural filling and emptying basin in which ship repairs could be made.

Discussions have not reached the stage of a serious recommendation from the Navy department as yet, but the idea is rather appealing to some New Dealers who have been worried about Quoddy as a political issue.

Causes Some Worry

It has been especially worrying because the marching up the hill and down again, with congress turning thumbs down on a project the President had started, with the President off fishing during the funeral, naturally attracted considerable attention in Maine. The state of Maine folks, politicos here think, are a very hard-headed lot, with strong objections to seeing their money wasted. So if the project could be turned into something that could be defended as useful—especially if the Maine folks could be convinced that the new naval base would add materially to Maine's industries—retreat could be turned into victory.

Quoddy then could actually be made an asset in getting out a good Democratic vote in September, with resulting psychological benefit to Democratic workers in other states, as they labored for Roosevelt's election in November.

All of which is the more interesting because a lot of sentiment is developing on Capitol Hill against spending all the billion and a half dollar relief appropriation the President has demanded for boondoggling projects.

"Florin ticked off the suspects.

"'Your ladyship, myself, the valet, Rachel, both the night-watchmen. . .'

"He hesitated there, so I dug in the spurs.

"'Is that absolutely all?'

"'Captain Faning knew,' said Florin.

"I gave a most lifelike start.

"'Captain Faning!' I cried. "So he did. And his servant, too.'

"It was Forin's turn to start.

"'And his servant?' he cried.

"'Yes, yes,' I cried. 'Both of them knew. His servant was there last night. I didn't know it when I was speaking to you. But he was behind the curtain. I don't know why.'

"Then I called upon Florin to find you—I gave all sorts of wild reasons why you must be found. And then I fainted, and good, honest Florin caught me and carried me down to my room.

"So you see I'm quite a good actress.

"Well, the hunt was up all right. Talk about sensation. . . . I could smell the lust for vengeance. The hornets were fairly off. Then I heard the incredible news.

"'Captain Faning' and his servant were gone.

"The position might be far better, for Pharaoh's at large. Still, it's very much better than it was. He's not only out of Yorick without any loss of life, but his flight has proclaimed him guilty of shedding blood.

"Well, the rest was very easy. I sent for old Florin and told him most of the truth. I told him that 'Faning' was Pharaoh and that Pharaoh was after the gold; that Pharaoh had killed young Florin and that since you, John, could prove this, he was going to take your life; that he'd only spared you till now—well, to serve his own ends; that, though that blood was your blood, for the moment I knew you were safe; but I said that your death was appointed and that, Pharaoh being Pharaoh, nothing on earth could save you—except his death."

She turned to Geoffrey.

"I don't have to ask if you agree with me there."

My cousin shrugged his shoulders.

"There's not much more to be told," Helena continued. "I said nothing of Valentine, of course. His return now might not be fatal, but he's very much better away. At a quarter to eight I left the castle a fortress and drove to Annabel."

"Unarmed and unaccompanied?" said Geoffrey.

Helena shrugged her shoulders.

"The risk was slight, and how could I take a servant to where I'd left Valentine? Yet it was vital that you should know at once that Pharaoh was out. To my dismay, you were gone, but as your room door was locked, I guessed you'd left Valentine there and so would come back. Well, we held a consultation. His orders were at once to remove the Count, and, much as I wanted to see you, I felt that for every reason those orders must take first place. You see, though Barley knew where he'd left you, neither he nor I had a map. I've been looking for you for six hours. I sat down and cried once. Sabre'll bear me out."

"The Position Might Be Far Better."

"Great heart," said Geoffrey quickly, and touched her hand.

Helena smiled.

"The glory to Sabre," she said. "And for all the good I've done, I might have given Barley a message—he'll be here in half an hour. I was able to help him, though. I diverted the household's attention while he got my wretched brother into the car. As for his ultimate disposal—well, when I look at you, I feel humble. I acknowledge a master brain. 'The Gordian knot of it he will unloose, Familiar as his garter.'"

"Pure chance," said Geoffrey lightly. "I'd painted the river just there, and the monks were very kindly and obviously simply stamping to use their skill. You know. Any friend of mine—"

This told me the truth of the matter. I knew where Valentine was. And that was some 60 miles off—in a private ward. This stood remote, its windows commanding the cloister of the convent to which it belonged. The only patients admitted were those alleged to have been bitten by dogs that were mad. The treatment lasted a fortnight.

"Well, there you are," said Helena. "There are the facts. And now, if you please, Mr. Bohun, what do we do?"

"We take you back to Yorick. I shan't know a moment's peace till you're where you belong."

"And then you're wrong," said Helena. "I'm going to see the fun."

* * * * * * *

In the discussion which followed I took no part and indeed I scarcely listened to what was said, for my thoughts would not leave the scene in the fragrant valley and at last, since I did not care, I tired of hailing them back and let them be.

Presently I got up and made for the road, while my cousin followed behind.

As I reached the stretch of macadam—

"There's nothing for it," said Geoffrey. "We shall all have to sleep at Yorick, because of this wilful girl. Perhaps she'll see reason tomorrow. How the devil can she lie out all night? She's all in now."

"She can't, of course," said I. "But what's that to do with us?"

"Only this," said my cousin. "That she won't sleep at Yorick unless we do. Her very words."

We strolled down the road in silence, from time to time turning about.

After a while my cousin pushed back his hat.

"As a child," he said, "I never liked blindman's buff—boys and girls, I mean I liked it less. That dislike I have never lost." He put his hands to his head. "I'd give a hell of a lot to know where Pharaoh is."

I looked at him sharply. The last few words he had spoken half to himself, but his tone was the tone of a man who is worried to death. Because I was fond of Geoffrey, the instinct to share his trouble lifted its head, and in that moment my apathy fell away.

Pharaoh. Yes, where was Pharaoh? and what would Pharaoh do?

As I asked myself these questions, my newly awakened interest leaped into life. I saw that here to my hand was the very distraction I needed to drive my distemper away; the location and destruction of Pharaoh and Pharaoh's men.

Yorick and its treasure be damned—I had my own quarrel with Pharaoh. Ten days ago he had murdered a fellow-man; I had sworn to bring him to justice, and so I would. More—a hundred times more. My duty to Helena was over; the yoke that had cumbered my efforts was off my neck.

I began to think very hard.

Pharaoh would be close to the castle. Not, of course, at Plumage. But Pharaoh would be close to the castle because he was up against Time.

I had no doubt at all that he meant to attack.

The position was formidable, for Yorick was up in arms. But what were its walls and sentries, when more than a million sovereigns were lying within? And since finesse had failed, Pharaoh was going to do what Pharaoh had done before. He as going to commit burglary. Once within the castle, a gang of four such men could have its own way. What were footmen and grooms and porters? Only troops could cope with the violence which these felons were ready to offer to gain their ends. Three or four writhing servants, and the Countess must open her cellar and bid them take what they would. Who knew better than Pharaoh that ruthlessness pays?

I remembered that Helena told me that when she went to Salzburg she carried a thousand sovereigns; that these were contained in two boxes; that each of these weighed nine pounds. Allowing for the weight of the boxes, I reckoned that the Rolls could carry at least fifty thousand sovereigns in canvas bags. And fifty thousand sovereigns meant seventy thousand pounds.

The calculation bore fruit.

Before I had finished my sum, I knew where Pharaoh would be. And that was as close to the castle as he could bring the Rolls.

A moment's reflection assured me that Pharaoh would make no use of the entrance drive. That was too dangerous.

I was ready to wager a fortune that the Rolls was now standing in Starlight—the lovely coppice less than two miles from Yorick. And where the Rolls was, was Pharaoh; her way was his line of advance and his line of retreat. The thing stood out. In the woods between Starlight and Yorick—somewhere there Pharaoh would be.

I began to wonder how Pharaoh would enter the castle. If Rush could reach a postern. . . . But how could they cross the bridge?

Here, with a shock of dismay, I remembered that I was unarmed. For a moment my hopes seemed dust. Then I saw that this was a matter in which I must use my wits. My cousin would arm me, if I could show him good cause. This would not be difficult. I was so simple a fool that he would never doubt my good faith. I began to think how to deceive him.

"This home-coming stunt," I said. "Won't Pharaoh be there to receive us—at the mouth of the entrance drive?"

"As like as not," said my cousin. "The only thing is that unless he heard or saw Lady Helena leave the castle, he'll never imagine that either of you are outside. So he won't be ready. Bu we'll have to go by all out. All th same, I'm damned uneasy. I can sym pathize with detectives who are an swerable for the safety of royalty. And I know very well what they'd do They'd take her straight to Salzburg and put a guard on her room." He gave his head to the air. "I'm tempted to go by Plumage, but, to tell you the truth, I'm afraid to get out of the car. If we meet the fellow on foot, we're damned well done. Will you go with ner in her car?"

"No," said I. "I won't. I'll follow with Barley behind."

"All right," said Geoffrey, "all right. But Barley's the better shot, so you'd better drive."

I thought before replying.

"Incidentally," I said, "I haven't a pistol to fire—or any sort of weapon, for the matter of that."

"You won't need one, if you drive."

"I'd rather have something," I said. "I've been caught bending once through being unarmed."

"Perhaps you're right," said Geoffrey. He put his hand to his side and unfastened a hunting knife. "Knives seem to be your portion, but except my pistol, I haven't anything else."

After Some 14 Miles We Stopped at a Wayside Inn.

The blade was sheated, and I slid the knife into my pocket without a word.

"And allow me to add," said my cousin, "that I am immensely relieved to see you showing some signs of taking thought for yourself. I take off my hat to valor, but to valor plus discretion I go on my knees."

And at that moment we heard the drone of a car.

Two minutes later Barley drew up beside us, in a smother of dust.

"O. K.?" said Geoffrey, shortly.

"Every time, sir," said Barley. "It couldn't have gone more easy if you'd been there. The old fathers, they wasn't half pleased. His lordship come to his senses as we was gettin' him out, but I don't think he cared what happened—his head was too bad. An' when he saw the monks an' the gateway, I think he thought he was dead. I gave them your note and I showed them the 'punctured wound.' I'd made it with my trousers' buckle, same as you said. That was good enough for them. Four of them carried him off, an' two of the others rushed off to heat the irons. I only 'ope they don't take his leg off."

My cousin strove to steady his voice.

"Hush," he said. "Her ladyship knows quite enough."

I turned to see Helena approaching.

"All's well," said Geoffrey. "Your brother is safely bestowed. I think we'd all be the better for breaking bread."

Helena nodded.

"I'll sit with Barley," she said. "I've got to try and show him the way to my car."

Ten minutes later we sighted a good-looking coupe, tucked under a rock that looked like a leaning pulpit, by the side of a fall.

As Barley slowed down—

"And now," said Helena.

"May I come with you?" said my cousin. "I'd like you to drive."

"Very well. But Barley must lead. I don't know the way."

This was not at all to my liking, but happily Geoffrey stepped in.

"Barley shall lead," he said, "till we've eaten and drunk. After that, I'd like to go first. Please do as I say."

Helena hesitated. Then—

"All right," she said.

After some 14 miles we stopped at a wayside inn. The fare was rough and all the appointments most rude; but I think we were all four thankful to break our fast. Though they did not know it, I was a good deal more thankful than anyone else; the others would find plenty at Yorick, but God only knew when and where I should eat again.

No more was said of the order the cars should take, and when our meal was over, the coupe was under way before I had taken my seat.

Quick as a flash—

"You'll have to drive, Barley," I said. "You haven't heard, but Dewdrop stuck me last night. I think he found a muscle or something. I'm stiff."

"Very good, sir," said Barley, and took the wheel.

A mile or two later—

"Where's your pistol?" I said. "I don't anticipate trouble, but now that you're driving, I'd better have it in case. I suppose you can guess who's got mine."

As Barley surrendered the weapon—

"Her ladyship did tell me something Fancy Dewdrop stabbin' you."

New York's Titterton murder mystery turns out not to be "the perfect crime."

Arthur Brisbane

The murderer, an upholsterer, carefully took away the cord used in his trade, with which he had bound the unfortunate woman, but forgot that he had left some strands of twine under the body, and those pieces of cord, thanks to excellent police work, trapped him. The sentimental who say, "Give the poor criminal another chance," will note that the murderer was a convict on parole when he killed the woman. He had "another chance" and made use of it.

Berlin reports a great Hitler forty-seventh birthday celebration including a fine display of military power—airplanes, war tanks, fighting men, apparently eager for a fight. They were young and could not remember the last war.

Particularly interesting were two lines in the song sung by storm troopers:

"Today we own Germany,
And tomorrow the whole world."

The day after Hitler celebrated his forty-seventh birthday old Rome celebrated her two thousand six hundred and eighty-ninth anniversary. Mussolini celebrates by launching two new Italian cruisers and speeding up airplane production. He tells Italian fathers and mothers he must have 60,000,000 population for Italy not later than 1950. In 1921, when Mussolini took charge, Italy's population was 38,000,000. There will soon be room and food to raise more Italians in Ethiopia. Easy for all but the mother.

England, doing well in a business way, with more than $2,000,000,000 worth of Bank of England notes circulating among tradesmen, is collecting gold and depleting the French reserves. While England tries to keep down the price of her "no-gold" pound, France is afraid she will not be able to keep up the value of her gold franc, already devalued by 80 per cent of its 1914 value. What becomes of the "magic in gold?" Our dear old dollar is worth only 59 cents, and only dealers in exchange know it.

Doctor Benedict, of Carnegie laboratories, finds that the adult elephant's heart beats from 22 to 30 times a minute, less than half the human heartbeat, and the elephant heartbeat is nine strokes faster when the animal is lying down. Man's heart beats more rapidly while he stands—because then it must raise blood the full height of the body. Old poets, with tired hearts, should do their writing lying down—the bloods flows horizontally with little heart-effort.

England is pleased; Sir Robert Hadfield, who makes tough steel, announces a shell for British naval guns that can pass unhurt through armor plate twelve inches thick and explode on the other side. "One shell of this kind fired in the region of the magazine would probably cause destruction of a modern battleship." England is manufacturing the shells rapidly; others are manufacturing airplane bombs that might make old-fashioned naval guns and shells useless.

In Miami a lady, first name Lois, and married, has husky triplet babies. Two gentlemen, the official husband and one other, demand custody of the triplets, each calling himself the real father. The alleged "father" who is not the husband would submit to any blood test, his lawyer says. How would King Solomon decide that?

Clarence Darrow, one of the country's most convincing lawyers, says on his seventy-ninth birthday:

"I say that religion is the belief in future life and in God. I don't believe in either."

The hoptoad beside the track, watching the express train go by, might say, reasonably enough:

"I do not believe in such a thing as a locomotive engineer."

Moscow has returned to the Japanese government in Manchukuo, with full military honors, the bodies of three Japanese killed in a fight with Soviet guards. The military honors will not console the widows, and, repeated often enough, such incidents lead to war.

Europe envies our fortunate country, which gives only paper dollars and inflation paper bonds to its citizens but has, buried in the ground, the biggest lump of gold on earth.

A wonderful thing is micro-chemistry. It tells scientists that off the coast of Greenland sea water contains more gold than in New York harbor; that one village in Switzerland has less goitre than another because in the first the dewdrops contain more iodine.

Twenty Billion Years Is Age of Universe, Scientist Declares

Harvard Findings Differ With British Estimate

CAMBRIDGE, MASS. — The universe is not so old after all! Flatly contradicting Sir James Jeans' figure of ten million times a million years for the age of the universe, Dr. Bart J. Bok of the Harvard college observatory has found that number approximately five hundred times too high.

Twenty billion years is the upper limit of the age of the universe, as viewed by Doctor Bok. Jeans' long time scale does not fit with the evidence of star clusters, with the known facts of the rotation of the Milky Way system or with the existing theories of the creation of the spiral nebulae. Nor does it explain the existence in the same star cluster of "young" red giant stars and of "old" dwarf stars.

"The giants with their tremendous energy output can hardly have existed for much longer than 10,000,000 years, unless we wish to make the as yet unfounded hypothesis that the energy radiated away is being replenished in some unknown fashion from surrounding space," Doctor Bok said.

A Stellar Catastrophe.

"We found it unlikely," he concluded, "that the observed clusters have existed for more than twenty billion years as groups of stars. Lemaitre's theory of the expanding universe indicates that a catastrophe took place a few billion years ago, and it is tempting to place the origins of the stars and stellar systems at the epoch of this catastrophe."

Hundreds of star clusters, including the well known Pleiades, Hyades, and Taurus, would now be on the verge of disintegrating all at once, torn apart by the gravitating forces of the Milky Way, if they had been in existence as long as Jeans believes, Doctor Bok has found.

How Age Is Figured.

"In the course of their development these clusters must have wandered through widely different parts of our galaxy, but in spite of this, under Jeans' long time scale we would find them ready to disintegrate, cosmically speaking, simultaneously," he said. "In other words if we were to take our observations at a future epoch removed from the present by only half a per cent of the total supposed age of our galaxy, no sign of them would be left.

"It seems absurd to assume that several hundred clusters, all of which had presumably considerable mass and density at the time of their birth, would be observed simultaneously on the verge of disintegration in a galaxy for which the conditions that determine the rate of disintegration will be apt to vary from point to point."

Astronomer Finds New Star Dust Rings in the Milky Way

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—Three tremendous rings of star-dust, hitherto unknown planetary nebulae, have been found in the Milky Way by Mrs. Muriel M. Seyfert, young research assistant at the Harvard college observatory.

Each of them is believed to be hundreds of times larger than our entire solar system, yet they are so far distant they can be seen only through moderately powerful telescopes. Even then, the rings are not visible to the human eye but can only be detected on sensitive photographic plates where they appear as luminous rings surrounding brilliant nucleus stars.

Actualy the tremendous nebulae are not rings but spheres or balls of expanding gas and tiny particles, some of them probably as fine as molecules. From their appearance on plates, however, astronomers have named them "ring nebulae." Mrs. Seyfert's discoveries were made through an examination of plates taken at Harvard's station at Bloemfontein, South Africa.

Billion Mile Diameter.

While sufficient data have not yet been assembled to permit accurate calculation of the size and distance of the rings, Harvard observers believe that like most of the approximately 130 known planetary nebulae, those found by Mrs. Seyfert are several hundred light years away from the earth and have a diameter that is expressed in billions of miles.

At present, astronomers express their size in terms of the angle formed by imaginary lines drawn from the observer's eye to the top and bottom of the stellar body.

Farm Jurors Don't Know Hay Baler; Judge Asks Picture

Attorney Paul O. Cooper, representing a client in Fairmont, Minn., suing for damages allegedly suffered in a collision between an automobile and a hay baler, thought the jury of 12 farmers knew about hay balers. But they told Judge J. E. Haycraft they had never seen one, although much hay is raised hereabouts. Then it developed Attorney Cooper couldn't describe one either, so Judge Haycraft told him to bring a picture.

Hitch-Hiker Is Menace As Well As Nuisance

It is impossible to drive anywhere in America today without encountering a patient, droop-shouldered chap who stands by the roadside and continously jerks his thumb across his chest.

He is the hitch-hiker, one of the strangest products of the auto age, and he is getting to be a prominent part of the American landscape. He is also getting to be an intense pain in the neck.

Just why it should be considered proper for a man to stand by the roadside and beg free transportation from total strangers is something of a mystery. If he should amble up to a pedestrian and say "I want to take the next train to Bingville—would you mind slipping me three ninety-five?" the pedestrian would lose no time in telling him where to go; but put the pedestrian behind the wheel of a car and let the hitch-hiker make a request which amounts to precisely the same thing, and neither party sees anything especially odd about it.

But the hitch_hiker is something more than a nuisance. America is full of nuisances anyway, and one more or less hardly makes enough difference to be worth talking about. There are times and places when the hitch-hiker is an actual menace to public safety.

For instance: the police at Wichita, Kan., got curious recently and took all the hitch-hikers they could find down to headquarters to be fingerprinted. They found that two of every five had criminal records.

For another instance: murders of motorists by hitch-hikers have been recorded recently in Oregon, Virginia, Nebraska, New Mexico, and Oklahoma. Oklahoma, as a matter of fact, ascribes more than half a dozen recent killings to hitch-hikers, while Oregon has had three.

The ordinary American is a pretty good-natured sort of person, and it is this fact that the hitch-hiker trades on. He collects a great deal of free transportation, promotes the existence of a vagabond class which does the country no good, and creates a fine opening for a lot of old-fashioned highway robbery.

As an individual, the hitch-hiker may be a likable chap. As an institution, he is getting to be pretty trying. One wonders just how much longer the American motorist will put up with him.

Death On The Highway

The Travelers Insurance Company has issued a book entitled "Live and Let Live." It deals, through statistics and graphic illustrations, with the traffic accident record in 1935, when 36,100 lives were destroyed by automobiles. It would be a great thing for the cause of safety if every citizen would read the booklet, meditate upon it, and act upon the lessons it gives and implies.

What caused serious accidents last year? As in the past, excessive speed was the undertaker's best friend, accounting for 31 per cent of all accidents in which persons were killed and injured. A heavy foot on the accelerator smooths the path to the morgue.

Next came driving on the wrong side of the road, the cause of 17 per cent of the accidents. "Keep to the right" seems to be a laugh to many drivers.

Cars not having the right of way caused 15 per cent of the accidents. Their drivers saved a second or two—at the expense of life and health.

Fourteen per cent of the accidents occured when cars drove off the roadway. Many causes may enter into this type of accident—and drunken driving, which seems to be on the increase, is among them. A substantial portion of motorists must be taught, no matter how roughly, that alcohol and gasoline make a poor mixture.

Think over this list. How often have you been guilty of one or more of the violations listed? Sure, you got away with it last time—but remember that next time you may not be so lucky.

ROSES OF REMEMBRANCE

"The roses of remembrance
Entwine my heart today
And fill my soul with fragrance
Enshrined in Love's bouquet.
The gleams of golden memories
Like sunbeams round me play
Bringing back the old dreams
From Love's sweet yesterday.
Dear roses of remembrance,
I press you to my breast
And dream the old dreams over
Of days divinely blest.
Once more in Love's fair garden
I breathe the perfumed air
Kissed by crimson roses
My heart left blooming there."

ROSES have long been the sweetest messengers of friendshi p and love that could be presented, and the most satisfactory expression one could receive in bringing that ever illusive thing called HAPPINESS. Just how many times my pathway has been brightened by these Spring harbingers from thoughtful people I can not tell, but I do most sincerely wish to express my keen gratitude for the above poem sent to me by the author, J. E. Ramsey of Birmingham with a very lovely inscription on the original manuscript—and pecuiiarly fitting i tseems this morning to open the page I so happily send you each week. The office is redolent with ROSES—I wish all of you could take a little peek into this journaljstic retreat of mine and see the gorgeous blooms which came from my good frind Mrs. O. F. Lokey, whose picturesque home on Coosa River is a veritable bower of roses and a lovely haven of rest for her many friends who adore visiting in this hospitable home. Mayor Harry Gordon, despite the fact that he is a very busy man, has never failed to bring me my share of "flowers" while I lived to enjoy their fragrant beauty. The vase of Talisman specimens is too beautiful for any adjective I know to adequately describe it. From the prettiest "girl in town"—Lanice Curlee come two dozen red, red roses plucked from her own lovely garden and thoughfully presented to us—with a smile equally as pretty as the choiciest bloom now in our possession Noland Barnett—brings POENIES—pink and white—and by the way, you may purchase some of these gorgeous blooms—if you will hurry and place your order!

So, the daly begins in a happy way! To friends who make it possible, I offer my heart's deepest apperciation!

FOR MEN ONLY

One of the most popular jokes about fifty years ago found in the old files of the Progressive Farmer was nevertheless intended for men only. Hence in order to avoid offending the sensibilities of a host of ladies whose friendship we so highly value we are printing it upside down and in small type so that any woman will find it very easy to skip it. Further more we disavow all responsibility for it now and throw all the blame on whatever male concocted it about 1886:—

YOU yet! Sure, I mean YOU!
BETTER LOOK OUT—it will get
CURIOSITY once killed a CAT—
If she had to stand on her head!
somehow
We know she would get at it
This poem she has already read

Now we'll wager ten cents to a

If she gets the least kind of a

But you may bet she'll find it

It's something she ought not to

Mrs. Olive Harrison, former Editor and Owner of the Montevallo Times, now filling a responsible position with the Graves Admnistration in Montgomery, was a distinguished visitor in the Democrat office on Saturday. Mrs. Harrison states she is delighted with her new work but ever and anon she is afflicted with Newspaper Nostalgia. We are there fore, predicting, when her official duties in Montgomery end, she will reenter the fascinating art of relating interesting facts about "folk and things". THEY, who have long travelled the newspaper trail, tell me after one dip in printers ink, one can never rid themselves of its magnetic power to hold you forever in its relentless routine of word juggling. After talking with Mrs. Harrison we are prepared to believe it's true.

WILLIE THOMASON

One of the livest wires we know anything about, and one of the most worth while fellows we have met is Willie Thomason of Siluria. We know of no happier note on which to close this Personal Mention page than the one we struck when we opened a letter from this young writer who has for the past few seasons edited our Sports Column, and for years our SCOUT COLUMN! In the welcome communication Mr. Thomason sends us, in included 43 new subscribers to the Democrat. We personally thank Mr. Thomason for his excellent work and extend greetings with a sincere welcome to each new reader we happily place in our ever widening circle of Democrat readers.

There is, by the way, a very strong tie between these two towns—Columbiana and Siluria—for mutual interest centers around the Probate Judge, L. C. Walker; the Treasurer, Henry Naish; one of the most popular members of the Board of Education, Dr. J. A. Hines; and Sam Tatum, Member of the Board of Revenue—all gentlemen hailing from this enterprising town above named. We have, at least, "daily" claim on these gentlemen who travel "to and from" their official duties. So it is with additional pleasure that we have the privilege of extending a sincere welcome to the 43 new readers we shall greet thru the columns of the Democrat this week.

We would like very much to work out a plan with Mr. Thomason where by he could go to Cuba this summer with the Alabama Press Association as our official representative. We personally regret we cannot "Rock the Boat" with Cody Hall—Cullen Morgan—and several other "brainy" specimens who have been kind enough to want us to go along but, may be, we can work out some plan where by young Mr. Thomason can make the Boat before it leaves for that picturesque, intriguing, beautiful, tropical clime. We are thinking hard! We would like to see him take advantage of this opportnity!

Don't forget May 10th!—Mother's Day!

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

Last week we had a little chat on The Flag. This week we are going to have a similiar chat, only this is to be concerning First Aid. The benefits of studying and putting into practice the art of First Aid.

It is, not at all hard to realize the necessity of the practice of First Aid First Aid is, in the opinion of all leading Scout officials, absolutely ne cessary for a complete Scouting program.

Too often this art is only studied instead of being actually put into actual practice. When stpdying this phase of Scouting, the Scoutmaster should make doubly sure that the Scout not only studies and learns it suitable to pass the requirements but goes through all the practices as he would if the accident had actually occurred.

Handle the patient as if he were really injured. Handle him carefully and as skillfully as possible. Many times some of the boys may try to make a joke of it. Patrol leaders and other proper authorities should have a heart-to-heart talk with these boys. They have merely failed to realize the importance of the practice and will readily fall in line and give you the best of cooperation once you have convinced them of its importance.

Since Scouting calls for a great deal of hiking in the country and woods, we should give the study of the snake bite quite a bit of our time. Of course, you understand, you are not expected to become good enough at this to be able to cure the bite entirely. Nevertheless, you may be able to be of great service to the doctor. Then too, you may be able to save alife by knowing enough to keep the poison from circulating.

Artificial respiration is another phase of this requirement that should be studied and practiced thoroughly. You may be able to study as well as practice a good portion of this in the open without going through the motion of rescuing the patient from water or electricity.

Whenever circumstances permit the entire motion should be gone through. Of course, such things as rescuing the patient from water in the winter which such action is absolutely unnecessary except for practice, will have t obe forgotten until the summer months. Unless you may be fortunate enough to secure th ese of an indoor swimming pool.

Too often minor injries are completely neglected. Scouts should pride themselves as one group or individual that gives the minor injuries strict attention. Many times small sores become infected and cause a great bit of trouble, and sometimes actually causes death.

Let's make the study of First Aid one of our major studies for the next month.

Longer Life Is Hope From Study of Age, Scientists Hold

Cells of Aged Animals Found to Grow Rapidly

MILLIONS are alive today who, if they had been born a generation or two ago, would have fallen victims to smallpox, diphtheria or one of the other great killers of former times. The disease fighters of modern medical science learned to conquer these plagues, only to be confronted with other disease enemies of an entirely different sort—cancer, heart and kidney disease.

Diseases of the heart and blood vessels which today take first place as cause of death are due not so much to "germs" and poisons as to the process of growing old.

At Columbia university the problem is being attacked by a study of the aging process itself. An important first step was taken when one of the Columbia investigators, Dr. Henry S. Simms, found that the body cells of aging animals will grow outside the body in what are called tissue cultures just as readily as cells from the bodies of very young animals.

Study Aging Process.

While the cells of aged animals will grow as readily, however, another Columbia scientist found that some of these aged cells do not function as well. It seems to depend on which organs of the body the cells came from. This seems to parallel the fact that some organs of the body, the heart, for instance, wear out and are unable to keep going or functioning normally earlier than other organs.

The cells from the lymph glands and the liver showed the greatest decrease in functional activity.

Long Time Required.

"Just how much significance is to be attached to these observations is not known at present," Dr. James W. Jobling, professor of pathology at Columbia College of Physicians and Surgeons, said in describing the studies of aged tissues.

"But we hope to expand and continue this phase of the work, for it is possible that here we may find some clew to the answers we are seeking. Studies are also being conducted on cancer and arteriosclerosis."

Billion Dollar Loss From Rust Faces U. S. Every Year

NEW YORK.—There is much alarming comment these days on the size of the public debt. It costs about a billion dollars a year merely to pay the interest on this loan.

Few people, however, feel vitally concerned about the money lost due to the rusting of their property.

Dr. R. M. Burns of the Bell Telephone laboratories here points out, however, that this loss due to rust is approximately as large as the interest on the public debt.

One of the most widely used rust preventives is paint, and 120,000,000 gallons are used annually; one gallon for every person in the country.

How Metals Corrode.

In an article in the Bell System Technical Journal, Doctor Burns describes the various processes which occur when metals corrode. What finally happens is, of course, that the metal goes into chemical combination with something else and is rendered useless.

It may seem a far cry from a rusty nail to the battery in a flashlight. But actually the formation of rust on the nail is, to a large extent, a result of the action of thousands of tiny electric batteries on the surface of the iron.

Most school boys know that a battery can be made of an iron rod and a copper rod dipped into a solution of some salt or acid. If he has tried it he knows also that, as the battery is used, the iron is gradually destroyed.

The same process occurs on the surface of the metal. The metal itself and some speck of impurity on its surface are "immersed" so to speak, in a film of moisture taken from the air. The metal and the pieces of impurity are, of course, in electrical contact so that the microscopic batteries run continually and the iron is slowly but surely eaten up.

Invisible Fish Line New Threat to Trout

WASHINGTON. — Fishermen and amateur anglers stand to benefit from the latest event in the life of tungsten, the metal which replaced carbon filaments in electric light bulbs.

Christian Dantsizen, Schenectady, N. Y., inventor, has just been awarded a U. S. patent here which describes the use of tungsten wire, as fine as human hair, in fishing tackle. He claims it will be of great value in fishing because it is apparently invisible to fish, especially trout.

And that his is not another "fish" story is indicated by the fact that General Electric company, which uses miles and miles of tungsten wire in light bulbs, has taken over his patent.

Hats to Match Top Juvenile Coats

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

GRANTED that mother and big sister are looking too chic and charming for words this spring, in their new spic and span stylish tailleurs or their bolero costumes, if not a redingote outfit that contrasts print with plain, to which there has been added accessories utterly feminine and seductive as accessories must be that would go high-style this season.

However, we are not saying that voguishly attired adults are the whole show, not when a bevy of stylishly arrayed youngsters join the procession. Then does competition become keen and it is the tiny tots in their new spring outfits that will be getting the big applause, we venture to say, be their elders ever so beguilingly garbed. Which they should for children's fashions are as cunning and intriguing as fancy dare picture this season.

As a fashion "first" for spring it is the little coat-and-hat ensemble that is taking precedent at the immediate moment. It adds zest to the mode that children's coats are unusually versatile this season in the matter of styling. Then, too, a particularly wide choice of materials is offered. Tweeds in delectable colorings, camel's hair weaves, navy twills, novelty wool plaids and serge are all-important in the list of juvenile coatings.

Close attention is being paid to tailoring and styling, with the English trend dominating. Inverted pleats, crisp collars, velvet pipings as well as insets in tailored collars are high style details to consider. Most important to remember is that fashion decrees that every wee coat or suit is to be companioned by a matching hat.

While grown-ups are going in for daring color to the limit, high colors are not so much in the children's wear picture. As a matter of fact, it is the medium tones that are most generally in use this season. Pastels are also definitely favored in aqua, dusty and skipper blue in the order named. Many all-white coats will be worn.

Full length coats are more popular than the short jackets, although the ever beloved reefer type jacket of navy flannel continues to hold its own. The trio of models pictured were selected for illustration from among a collection of little folk's fashions displayed at a preview style event recently held at the Merchandise Mart in Chicago.

The clever little coat to the left is one of the new and very much admired Princess Elizabeth types. It carries that convincing air of distinction such as every fashion-alert mother covets for her child. Tweed in the popular dusty rose shade fashions it. Cunningingly flared lines, the double breast button fastening, and the deftly tailored details of collar, cuffs and pockets are all significant style items. The collar of natural linen is detachable.

The little girl walking hand-in-hand so chummily with her companion has on a very attractive long reefer coat in navy blue. White metal buttons and a white hand-embroidered lingerie collar add chic finishing touches. The perky matching hat is of cloth identical with that of the coat.

The adorable child in the foreground has on a coat of skipper blue novelty weave wool with the Princess Elizabeth lines given to it such as are regarded as exceedingly smart for the younger set this spring. Her matching Scotch cap repeats the trim of blue plaid silk used on the coat.

MULTI-DUTY GARB URGED FOR SPRING

There's a lot of talk these days about the "basic wardrobe," which is a good idea for the spring budgeteer.

The idea is to select the spring suit, coat and printed frocks in one color theme, to be worn with interchangeable accessories. Suppose, for instance, you start with one of the smart new man-tailored suits with black jacket and striped skirt. With it, if you shop wisely, you will get an extra skirt to match the jacket.

Then you should choose a topcoat in tailored style, also black, which may be worn over the suit or with a printed silk frock.

Your printed silks should be bright, gay and simply made, so that you may wear various frilly lingerie accents with them, changing their mood with the jabot or collar you select. With these for a foundation, you may achieve endless variety by choice of contrasting accessories.

Parasols and Fans Give Frivolous Touch to Garb

Parasols add a frivolous touch to many summer outfits. In bright printed cottons they appear with beach costumes and in polka-dotted silks they accompany summer suits. Some of them have long crook handles.

Folding fans made of field flowers, tulle or organdy and flat oval lacquer fans, only a little larger than a hand, lend a glamorous air to evening costumes.

New Gloves

Don't put on the gloves for the first time when in a hurry. Even if you do get them on without splitting they will never fit so well as when they are carefully put on, stretching the kid gently to conform with the lines of the hands. If this is done the first time, all other times will be easy.

WITH A VEIL

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

A bit of straw, a brim of closely stitched net, a full-blown rose and a fragile, frivolous, flattering veil and presto! The milliner evolves as seductive a little cocktail hat as the world e'er gazed upon. As here pictured this intriguing headpiece is posed by Helen Chandler who wears it in her newest play. It carries a highly important style message in the tight brim that frames the head, namely, the use of many layers of net closely stitched. Milliners are making many wide-brimmed hats as well as turbans and toques of stitched net this season.

Bowknot Motif

You can tie yourself in knots, fashionably speaking, this spring. Chanel sponsors the bowknot, and the new jewelry proves just how smart they look on a costume. Hinge bracelets carved in a bow have bright metal knots for contrast. The clip pairs carry out the same motif in little half bows with the same metal knots. They come in bright green, red, blue, white and black.

MATCHMAKER

"I DON'T like to be catty," Lillie Newhall said, "but you're wasting your time with Glen Fales."

Lillie surveyed her perfectly proportioned features in the dressing table mirror, and deftly tucked an unruly strand of hair back into place.

"Glen," she went on, "was the most popular man at Ryson Beach last summer. Even gorgeous Shirley Leighton made a play for him."

Naomi, standing in the doorway of the room which she shared with Lillie Newhall during the Thornton's week-end party, turned and went out without waiting to hear what else the girl might have to say.

Walking down the deep-cushioned stairs, she sighed heavily.

She understood what Lillie had meant.

Lillie was warning her, ordering her to keep out of the way, because she didn't stand a chance with Glen anyhow.

Which was right.

She wasn't fool enough to let herself think she stood a chance with him—not with such a beautiful creature as Lillie to compete with.

Naomi knew she was ordinary in looks and ordinary in her ways with men.

And because of this she wondered why Grace Thornton had invited her down for the week-end.

Suddenly she remembered that it hadn't been Grace, but Lillie who had engineered the invitation.

Lillie? Why should Lillie—?

Naomi stopped in her descent of the stairs.

It came to her in a rushing flood of horror.

Lillie had wanted her there for the sake of comparison!

She knew that her own attractiveness would be far more pronounced if someone like Naomi were on hand.

The realization was sickening.

Even that warning had been part of Lillie's scheme.

For Lillie knew that if she warned Naomi to keep off, the latter would instinctively resent her attitude and attempt to win Glen Fales' interest, which was exactly what Lillie wanted.

She Turned, but He Seized Her Wrist. "You're a Fool!"

Out on the terrace, Grace Thornton rushed up to her with extended hands.

"Darling! So glad you could come."

"Hello, Grace. I'm glad to be here."

A man and a woman were standing near, and Grace led Naomi up to them.

"Glen, this is Naomi Peterson. You remember her? She was at Ryson last summer."

"Of course," Glen Fales, tall, handsome, tanned, smiled down at Naomi and took her hand. "Of course I remember. Let me see, there were two of you. I mean—you had a friend—"

"Yes. Lillie Newhall. She'll be down in a moment."

Naomi tried hard to keep the bitterness out of her voice.

She wanted to add: "You'll always find me where Lillie happens to be. She drags me around so that men will notice how beautiful she is."

Grace Thornton fluttered away to greet other guests, and Naomi found herself alone with Glen Fales.

"It's good seeing you again," he was saying, but his eyes were looking over her head.

"She'll be here presently," Naomi said briefly.

Glen regarded her in surprise.

"Who?" he asked.

"Lillie. She was about ready when I left."

"Oh. I see."

He seemed on the point of saying more, but at the moment Lillie appeared, and Grace brought her across the terrace.

In the excitement of the reunion that followed, Naomi moved away.

She felt a little sick; not equal to the task of watching Lillie employing her man-catching artifice.

An hour later, sitting near the fish pond, she saw Glen Fales coming across the lawn.

She thought: "Lillie has escaped him. That's part of her game—never appear too eager . . . He wants to talk to me about her. Men are funny that way."

Glen Fales sat down beside her, uninvited.

"Been looking for you everywhere," he smiled.

"You know, I remember last summer—"

"Lillie said you would," Naomi interrupted.

"I mean she remembered, too, and was looking forward to this week-end."

"Was she?" Glen arched his brows in that curious way he had.

"Actually. But please don't tell her I said so. She'd die of mortification."

"Then why do you tell me?"

Naomi stood up.

"Because it's what you wanted to know."

She set off along the path that led back to the house.

"I don't blame you for your interest. Lillie's beautiful, and—and I'm sure you'll have no regrets."

He caught up with her before she'd taken ten steps.

"Listen, why the intense interest in me and your friend. I mean are you a matchmaker or something?"

She turned on him, eyes alight.

"Matchmaker! Isn't that the role I'm supposed to play?"

She laughed.

"Lillie depends on me. I can't fail her in her hour of need."

Throughout the evening Naomi succeeded in avoiding Glen Fales.

She saw him watching her, felt his eyes following her about the dance floor.

And suddenly she hated him.

Hated him because he was making her unhappy and miserable, because she knew he wanted to talk to her about Lillie.

That would be torture.

It wasn't as it should be, not when the feeling in her heart was of its present nature.

She saw him dancing with Lillie, saw them stroll on to the terrace together, and, at length, unable to stand it longer, she left the ballroom and headed for the stairs.

At the foot of the stairs she paused.

Glen Fales had appeared from nowhere and had called to her.

There was a curious expression in his eyes.

"Aren't you being just a little ridiculous?"

"Whatever do you mean?"

"I mean all this talk about your friend Lillie—and me."

Naomi laughed.

The laugh bordered on hysteria.

"Mr. Fales, I don't know what you're talking about. I—I've done what was—expected of me—as best I could—and now—I—I'm through. I can't go on."

She turned, but he seized her wrist.

"Wait a minute."

He drew her close to him.

"You're a fool! A little fool!"

Tears were in her eyes.

"Yes—I am! I know I am! Let me go!"

"No. I've been trying to talk to you all evening. The best I could do was talk to your friend Lillie—about you. She is vastly annoyed and disgusted. She finally went off with Ray Philbrick and left me alone."

Naomi swayed a little, and he caught her in his arms.

"You're—lying. It isn't the truth. You're trying to make it easy. You know I love you—and you're trying not to hurt me. It's Lillie you want. She's beautiful and—"

He crushed out her words with his lips.

He held her close for long minutes . . . released her at last . . . looked into her eyes.

"Now do you believe it's you I love? And no one else?"

Naomi closed her eyes.

After a moment she opened them.

He was still there, still with the same intent, honest look in his eyes. . . . For answer she pulled his face down to her lips once more. . . .

"I Spy" Mirrors Survive in North French Homes

Although northern France is one of the most up-to-date and prosperous regions in the nation, one picturesque aspect of the Middle ages still persists—the "I Spy" mirrors which permit the householders to spy upon persons passing in the street, observes a (Lille) France United Press correspondent.

In French these mirrors are called espionos which, translated literally, means "spies" and the dictionary gives this definition: "A looking glass so placed near a window to show persons coming or going outside." In principle, this mirror is the same as the one placed before a chauffeur in an automobile so that he can see what is behind him.

Such mirrors have existed in French Flanders for centuries, but they are to be found nowhere else in France. Almost every house is equipped with one or two of these mirrors right next to the principal window of the ground floor. Those on the inside thereby are permitted to see everything that goes on outside, without being seen by those whom they are inspecting.

These mirrors also are used in keeping out undesirable persons. When the bell rings, the maid looks into the mirror and reports to her mistress. If the visitor is persona non grata, the mistress remarks: "Let her ring, don't open the door, I don't want to see her today."

Even the more recently built dwelling houses are equipped with these mirrors.

Valuable Fishing Rights

In 1924 in Peiping, China, a man bought the "fishing rights" in the pond of the old Winter Palace for three years for $450,000—and made a fortune without selling a fish. All he did was to dredge for the countless gold identification tags that had been attached to the numerous fish given daily as gifts to the emperors for more than 300 years.—Eliot White, Roselle, N. J., in Collier's Weekly.

"Love Alliances"

During the Age of Chivalry in Europe, when husbands and wives were not supposed to be in love with each other, many knights and ladies who were married to others entered into platonic partnerships called "love alliances." Strangely enough, says Collier's Weekly, these alliances were frequently solemnized by a religious ceremony and were harder to dissolve than regular marriages.

Lesson for May 3

JESUS TEACHES FORGIVENESS, HUMILITY AND GRATITUDE

LESSON TEXT—Luke 17:1-19.

GOLDEN TEXT—Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.—Ephesians 4:32.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Man Who Said Thank You.

JUNIOR TOPIC — The Man Who Thanked Jesus.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC — Three Marks of Christian Strength.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC. — Three Marks of Christian Strength.

I. Forgiveness, a Christian Obligation (vv. 1-4).

Owing to the fundamental fact of human individuality, the perversion by sin, and the power and wickedness of the devil, offenses, or occasions of stumbling, are bound to come. Because mankind is fallen and sin reigns in individual hearts, the results are bound to reveal themselves, but Jesus pronounces "woe" upon those whose evil deeds become a stumbling stone in the way of others, especially "one of these little ones."

The follower of Christ is to take heed that his life be not injurious, but that it be exemplary. The believer is to cultivate the forgiving spirit toward the wrongdoer, while rebuking the wrong. Great skill and grace are required to rebuke one for wrongdoing, revealing at the same time the forgiving spirit, so as to win him instead of exasperating him.

II. Humility, a Christian Quality (vv. 5-10).

Humility is at the heart of this trio of Christian graces. Much faith is required to establish and maintain humility. Human nature impels one to push others aside, to struggle for supremacy, to reach the exalted positions in life. Humility moves one to seek the lowly place, while giving places of honor to others, and being sincerely happy when others are granted the preferred positions. Surely, for this one must have faith in God.

III. Gratitude, an Uncommon Grace (vv. 11-19).

The account of the ten lepers is perhaps the most used Bible portion in enforcing the lesson of gratitude as against ingratitude. There are a number of things to be considered, if we are fully to understand the call for gratitude.

1. Their awful affliction (v. 12).

They were lepers. In that day no greater tragedy could befall one than to be thus afflicted. It was regarded as contagious and incurable. The afflicted person became a social outcast, and was avoided and neglected. The Mosaic law provided for segregation (Lev. 13:46).

Leprosy has always been regarded as typical of sin, and at times as visited upon individuals because of sin. Examples: the leprosy of Naaman (II Kings 5); Gehazi (II Kings 5); Miriam (Num. 12); Uzziah (II Kings 15:5).

Leprosy may lay long dormant, and then make a sudden appearance; so with sin. Leprosy waxes worse and worse; so with sin. And the end of sin is death.

2. Their cry for mercy (v. 13). The ten recognized their great need, and that no human help was available. Testimonies that had floated to their hearing told of a great Healer, and when He came their way they were not slow to make their prayer to him.

The faith of the lepers immediately revealed itself in acting upon the instructions of Jesus that they go and show themselves to the priest. While they went they were cleansed. They were to obey the Old Testament requirement for the recording of their cleansing, that they need no longer be outcasts. The sinner may find salvation along the path of daily duty, if he will but believe.

3. Their differing attitudes following healing (vv. 15-19).

a. The gratitude of the one (vv. 15, 16) is beautiful and inspiring. He is referred to as "this stranger," evidently a Gentile, but so deep was his gratitude he hastened back to Jesus to give thanks. The one who might be least expected to show gratitude was the one who sincerely expressed it.

b. The nine who neglected (vv. 17-19), who failed to give thanks, have through the centuries been charged with ingratitude. Their healing was as complete; they had as much reason to recognize Jesus as their healer as had "this stranger." Perhaps, as is true of so many believers of today, they took their benefits for granted and were indifferent rather than ungrateful. Many nowadays take all they can get from Christ and give nothing in return. The noblest blessings of civilization are ours through Christ, yet how few thank him for them.

Religion Must Come First

John Ruskin's emphatic words cannot be too often repeated: "Anything which makes religion its second object, makes religion no object. God will put up with a great many things in the human heart, but there is one thing he will not put up with in it—a second place. He who offers God a second place, offers him no place."

Taxis Replace Old Gharries as Vehicles in Holy City

The last of Jerusalem's famous fleet of ramshackle open horse drawn cabs has been relegated to the junk heap.

In their place modern taxicabs will convey the citizens of Jerusalem and visitors up and down the precipitous slopes of the Holy City.

Practically every visitor to Jerusalem used to take at least one drive in one of these horse cabs, or "gharries." They seemed as typically a part of the Jerusalem scene as gondolas in Venice or rickshas in Shanghai.

Unfortunately for the cab drivers, however, the steep city streets recently were asphalted for the benefit of automobile traffic. As a result the cab horses continually slipped and fell. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals intervened and made representations to the government resulting in the withdrawal of horse drawn cabs from the streets.

Alabama Power Customers Increase Use Of Electricity

Still Lower Rates Delayed by High Taxes, Says Report

In the annual report of Alabama Power Company, recently mailed to its stockholders, Thomas W. Martin, President, reports that while the sale of electricity to regular customers of the Company was almost 12% greater in 1935 than in 1934, the amount of money received for it increased only approximately 9%. Operating expenses and taxes increased over 12%, or one-third faster than revenue.

The report indicates that at the end of 1935 Alabama Power Company was rendering service directly to 515 communities in Alabama and in addition was serving 63 communities at wholesale. The average use of electricity in homes served by it gained substantially, while the average rates for the service declined sharply. During a ten year period, 1926-1936, the residential customers have increased their average use 152%, while the average rates have declined 54%.

This increased use of electricity is attributed in large part to the immediate-objective rate plan, under which the rate per kilowatt-hour becomes less with increased use by the customer, and which, established in Alabama in 1933 has since been adopted in whole or with modifications in 30 other states. However, a major part of the increase in use is felt to have resulted from the increasing appreciation of better lighting and more labor-saving devices in the home which has been brought about through aggressive effort on the part of the Company's sales department in cooperation with Alabama electrical merchants. The "immediate-objective" rate plan of 1933, which included a low rate of 1c per kilowatt-hour became available to all urban residential customers April 1, 1936. (In recent weeks a further downward revision of the rate has been made, resulting in immediate annual savings of $60,000 to approximately 20,000 customers, and permitting the additional use of $324,000 of electricity by 60 thousand customers, much of it at the low 1c rate).

The report states that as a result of the promotional activities of the Company, the average annual use of electricity per residential customer crossed the 1,000 kilowatt-hour mark in January, 1936, a record attained by only one other large utility company east of the Rocky Mountains. This average was exceeded in 61 communities served by Alabama Power Company during 1936. The annual use per residential customers in these communities ranged from 1,006 to 3,223 kilowatt-hours.

A chart contained in the report reveals that in these 61 towns or communities, the average annual use per residential customer equals or exceeds the average annual use in three of the towns so widely publicized by the TVA, and that there are 30 towns or communities served by Alabama Power Company where the use of electric service in the home is as great or greater than in three other towns served by TVA.

More than 50% of the electricity used in residences served by Alabama Power Company is provided at 2c per kilowatt-hour or less, and more than 20% is sold at 1¼c or less.

The report of the Company contends that its promotional activities accomplish more in creating an appreciation of and desire for the labor-saving, comfort-creating benefits resulting from the liberal use of electricity than does the lowering of the rates, because an understanding of what electricity will do for him is necessary before a customer will want to increase his use of it, whatever the rate. When he understands that increased use can lift labor and toil from the backs of women by lightening the burden of many home tasks; by protecting the health and lives of the family; by making the home a more pleasant place in which to live and thus improve the standards of citizensship in many ways, he wants to use more electricity.

At the close of 1935 the Company was serving approximately 40,000 rural customers; that is, customers located within rural areas and districts within the definition of the Federal Bureau of the Census.

Rural customers represent 35% of the 114,187 customers of the Company. Of these rural customers, approximately 30,000 were served at the Company's low urban rates. In 1935 the Company added 285 miles of lines to its rural system and has approved for construction during 1936, 729 miles of new rural lines, which added to the present lines, will make a total of 3,132 miles of rural lines.

A review of the Company's studies of soil erosion over the past two years is contained in the report, and states that as yet there is no serious impairment of the reservoir volume of its several dams, but views as serious the loss of fertile topsoil in the farms of adjoining counties. In October 1934 the Company planted its first seed beds for the propagation of slash pine near Jordan Dam, and in the spring of 1935 largely increased this planting. It also transplanted to its nurseries located near Wetumpka and Alexander City seedlings obtained from the State nursery at Livingston. In January of this year it planted great quantities of seedlings on lands which it owns adjoining Martin Dam.

THOMAS W. MARTIN

Twenty-one different kinds of direct taxes are paid by the Company, of which 14 are State and 7 Federal. Total taxes paid equal 15c out of every dollar collected by the Company and are approximately equal to 75% of the total salaries and wages paid to its 2,200 employees. These taxes totalled $2,565,967.96 in 1935, an increase of nearly 11% over 1934. The report states that the constant tendency of Federal, State and local governments to take each year an increased share of the earnings of the Company constitute a major threat to its stability and the continuity of dividends to thousands of stockholders who have invested their savings in it. It is suggested that those responsible for raising public revenues, the institutions supported by such revenues, and other taxpayers, should recognize that in each instance of entry of government into the realm of private endeavor, no matter in what particular line, the flow of taxes from the business replaced is practically, if not altogether cut off, thus forcing the tax collecting authorities to make up the deficit by higher levies upon the diminishing number of those left in the ownership of private property.

The striking example of this condition resulting from the gradual taking over of electric operations in the State under the TVA plan of operation presents a problem which educational and government authorities and the taxpayers must meet, namely: how and from whom will this deficit be made up?

The report contrasts Alabama Power Company's payment of taxes on lands acquired by it for the same purposes as those of the TVA, namely the production and sale of electric energy. The Company's lands are assessed on the average 50% higher than adjoining lands of other taxpayers, while the TVA pays no taxes on the land it acquires, removing from the tax rolls, according to a recent 1936 report of the Bureau of Business Research, University of Alabama, assessed values of $3,000,000 in Limestone, Lauderdale, Madison and Morgan Counties.

In the report President Martin states, "Perhaps we may take hope from the recent expression of Dr. Morgan, Chairman of TVA, quoting the President as follows: 'If they (public plants) are to serve as comparisons, they must be open and above-board, with nothing hidden. They must be fair, with no special, arbitrary advantages. They must pay taxes, just as private companies must do, and every other reasonable charge, if they are to provide us with a fair comparison.'"

A review of the TVA situation as it affects the Company is contained in the report, which states "The rates of TVA bear no fair relation to the total costs of supplying the service. If this Company could be relieved in the same proportion of its obligation to pay interest and dividends, and be placed on the same basis as the TVA with respect to taxes, it could reduce even the TVA rates by more than 25%.

"The bookkeeping of the TVA and TVA's exemption from taxation do not mean that the cost of producing and distributing electric energy has been reduced. Such procedure by the TVA merely shifts the cost of electric service from present users to taxpayers throughout the United States."

FOR CONGRESS

Tom Maxwell of Tuscaloosa County, Alabama, is a candidate for Congress to represent Alabama's 6th District composed of the Counties: Bibb, Chilton, Greene, Hale, Perry Shelby, Sumter and Tuscaloosa. He asks for support by the ladies and gentlemen Democrats who have gray in their hair those also who will cast their first ballots on May 5th, 1936, and those of all ages in between the other two classes. His platform includes the idea that the Farmer should earn more for his produce than the cost of production in order that he might spend and thus aid all other businesses and adequate pensions for the aged.

W. W. RAMSEY ANNOUNCEMENT

THOS. H. MAXWELL FOR CONGRESS

THOS. H. MAXWELL of Tuscaloosa, Ala., Route 1 candidate for Congressman from the Sixth District, composed of Chilton, Bibb, Greene, Hale, Perry, Shelby, Sumter and Tuscaloosa Counties, is a Veteran of two wars.

PLATFORM

I am not on a privately owned corporation or state payroll and am backed by no Clique or ring.

I favor such legislation that the farmer receive more than cost for his products, that he spend money and thus aid all other vocations. Such is the main objective of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Therefore, let us have:

1. Collective bargaining for the organized farmer and organized industrial labor.

2. The thirty hour week in manufacturing to distribute the opportunities lessened by labor saving machinery.

3. Pensions paid wholly by the Federal Government, administered by states, of $30.00 per month to all persons of sixty or more years, whose incomes are less than $1,000.00 per year, which plank the gray haired, young and middle aged should support.

4. Federal loans at one-half of one per cent per annum to sovereign states for use in their schools, liquidating borrowed indebtedness, and for other purposes.

5. Erosion control for soil conservation.

6. Flood control with incidental conservation of power to be used in country homes.

7. A sufficiency of Constitutional money for conducting the nation's business without borrowing.

Pass this word by letter or post card or phone to the counties.

Bibb, Chilton, Greene, Hale, Perry Shelby, Sumter, Tucsaloosa, that every farm voter rally to polls on May 5th, 1936, rain or shine to elect their man while the other citizens are willing to vote for him. This is the splendid opportunity for Congress by properly applying the best of Constitutions can make the people happy and panicless.

Sincerely,

THOMAS H. MAXWELL,

(Paid pol. adv. by Thos. H. Maxwell, Tuscaloosa, Ala., Rt. 1)

PETE JARMAN FOR CONGRESS

It has been my intention and keen desire to see personally every voter in the Sixth Congressional District, not only to express the appreciation I sincerely feel for your wholehearted and virtually unanimous support, not only because I so thoroughly enjoy doing so, but also because these personal contacts more accurately inform me of the needs and wishes of our people.

Mere words are inadequate to impart to you the depth of my appreciation for your magnificent support. The overwhelming majority with which I feel sure you will see fit to favor me on May 5th strengthens my desire to make you a good Congressman, worthy of the confidence and friendship you have so generously bestowed upon me.

I have conducted no speaking campaign, nor have I appointed any managers, depending on all my friends, in every county to constitute themselves my managers in their own sphere of influence. I have preferred to visit you personally, taking leave of absence without pay from my duties on March 1, to indulge in a thorough contact campaign. I have attempted to cement our relationship with a universal bond, to organize our future work toward our common welfare. That is the goal toward which we strive. Although it has been a phyiscal impossibility to see each voter personally, I hope to be afforded that opportunity soon, and I anticipate with genuine pleasure the occasion of seeing you all in the future.

I urge all of my many thousands of good friends not to let overconfidence prevent us from obtaining an overwhelming victory, thereby sending me to Washington under the auspicious circumstances of your concerted effort and your solid support. A commanding majority will add greatly to my influence in your behalf in Congress. I trust that every qualified elector will exercise his Democratic inheritance and cast a vote on May 5th.

I take this opportunity to reiterate my pledge to work unceasingly for the people of this District. I shall ever hold the duties of office as an avowed public trust, with a cooperative attitude toward all. I thank you again from the bottom of my heart.

Sincerely your friend,
PETE B. JARMAN, JR.

4-H CLUB BOYS ENJOY PICNIC

About 130 4-H Club boys enjoyed a picnic Saturday, May 23, visiting the Dairy farm of W. B. Baker andSons and Alabama College, followed by a swim in Spring Creek and a picture show donated to the boys by Mr. Watson of the Strand Theatre.

Assembling at nine oclock at the Baker Dairy Farm, Mr Baker showed the boys the cows, calves and barn which was a real show; this was followed by a tour over the farm to see the alfalfa hay fields, oat and crimson clover being harvested and baled, and on to the permanent pasture. We would like for every farmer in Shelby County to visit this Dairy Farm.

The group next visited the Alabama College Dairy and were shown the barns and equipment and out to see the cows and calves. Mr. Bailey talked to the boys explaining the requirements necessary to make a success of dairying, what a good dairy cow should be, etc. The boys ate their lunch here and were served lemonade by Mr. Bailey.

The boys went from the College Dairy to the Creek near the Big Spring and enjoyed a swim; at two o'clock they went to the Strand Theatre, where they were guests of Mr. Eddie Watson, for the picture show.

Time Extended For Filing Worksheets

The State Conservation Committee has extended to May 30 the time for Alayama farmers to fill out work sheets under the new $470,000,000 national farm program.

There absolutely will be no extension o ftime beyond that date, said members of the committee when extending the time to give all growers an opportunity to fill out work sheets.

All growers are being urged to file work sheets as this in no way obligates them to cooperate or to apply for grants this fall. On the other hand, unless they do fill out work sheets before May 30 there is no way they may obtain a grant this fall even if they do carry out all ither provisions of the program.

Soybeans Should Be Planted Soon

Farmers planning to grow soybeans for seed production should make every effort possible to get them planted by the first of June, advised J. C. Lowery, extension agronomist, who states that farmers can save several thousand dollars annually by growing their own soybean planting seed.

Otootans, Laredos, and Mammoth Yellows are the most important for farmers to grow. They should be fertilized with either basic slag or superphosphate at planting time, he says.

Heart Drifts

PRECAUTION

They say friends, bit by bit
Can rear between their lives a mighty wall,
So thick they can not talk with ease through it,
Nor can they see across, it stands so tall!
Its nearness frightens them, but each alone
Is powerless to tear its bulk away
And each dejected, wishes he had known
For such a wall, some magic thing to say.

So let us build with master art, my dear,
A bridge of faith between your life and mine,
A bridge of tenderness, and very near
A bridge of understanding, strong, and fine—
Till we have formed so many lovely ties
There never will be room for walls to rise!

COURAGE TO LIVE

To those who have tried and seemingly have failed,
Reach out, dear Lord, and comfort them today;
For those whose hope has dimmed, whose faith has paled,
Lift up some lighted heavenly torch I pray,
They are so frightened, Lord, reach out a hand,
They are so hurt and helpless; be their friend.
Baffled and blind, they do not understand—
They think this dark and tangled road the end.

Oh, tuch to flame their hope that has burned low,
And strike with fire faith's ashes that are dead.
Let them walk proudly once again, and go
Seeking the sure and steadfast light ahead,
Help them to move among their fellow men
With courage to live, courage to try again.

VOTIVE CANDLE

A long wick and a pointed flame,
And wax from the honey-comb,
I would be a candle
And burn within your home.

I would light your page for you
And light you up to bed
And make a dazzle of the dark
And silver on your head.

TO A POET

Ah, Jester in the Court of Love
You juggle words with skillful art,
And vainly seek to banish pain,
Serving a king who broke your heart.

SONG FOR LOVERS

Let us be true, Love, with the faithfulness
That twin star follows twin across the deep,
Unfathomable blue. Oh, let us keep
This lovely priceless pearl that we possess
Unblemished all our days. Love let us press
Upward together when the way is steep,
And rout the various enemies that creep
Stealthily to our world to gain access.

For then will Life, which it already dear
Grow dearer and more lively to the eye.
And then will peace and certitude and cheer
Come in and sup with us and not pass by
And oh, for then by listening we may hear
Harp music floating downward through the sky!

Congressional Quizzers Stir Dr. Townsend to Wrath—Landon Has Big Bunch of Delegates—Guffey Coal Act Declared Invalid.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

FOR two days Dr. Francis E. Townsend replied mildly to the questions of the house committee investigating the activities of the organization behind the old age pension movement which the doctor started. Then the Californian lost his patience suddenly, refused to answer any more "nonsensical" queries, spoke of "thick-headed congressmen," denounced the committee for its "unfriendly attitude" and asserted the administration was a "hostile force" behind the inquiry. He declared he would form a third party after the November elections.

Dr. F. E. Townsend.

Finally Doctor Townsend told the committee: "I am retiring from this sort of inquisition and I do not propose to come back except under arrest. And I do refuse absolutely to make any further statement regarding this movement to this committee."

Escorted by Gerald K. Smith, former adherent of Huey Long, and another man, the Californian fled from Washington to Baltimore. The committee decided to ask the house to cite him for contempt.

When he was questioned regarding large sums contributed by Townsend club members the physician said the contributors had faith in him and that "we need millions to promote a movement of this kind and we will get them."

His testimony developed that Doctor Townsend, his brother, Walter Townsend, and Gilmour Young own the assets of the Townsend organization, estimated now at about $60,000, and that Townsend club members have no property right in them.

Doctor Townsend testified he has received about $68,000 in salary, dividends from the Townsend weekly and expenses, but now had only about $800 and his wife about $200 to show for their efforts.

GOV. ALF LANDON captured nearly all the New Jersey delegates to the national convention, defeating Senator Borah about 4 to 1 in the popular vote. This victory gave the Kansan a total of more than 200 votes to start with at Cleveland, and his manager, John Hamilton, claimed he would have at least 300 of the 501 votes necessary to nominate and would win on the second or third ballot.

The statement by Herbert Hoover taking himself out of consideration for the nomination is generally judged to have helped Landon. With Mr. Hoover out of the picture it will be difficult to hold California, Texas, and other potentially Hoover votes away from Landon.

James A. Farley, postmaster general and also Democratic national chairman, told the Michigan Democratic convention he believed the Republican Presidential nominee will be "the governor of a typical prairie state" and that his election, if he won, would be a "perilous experiment." Farley criticized the man he did not name as devoid of experience in national affairs, and predicted that if he is the Republican standard bearer "even Kansas" will not be in the Roosevelt doubtful column.

CONSTITUTIONALITY of the railroad retirement system was contested before the District of Columbia Supreme court by attorneys representing the class 1 railroads and 289 lesser railway enterprises. The lawyers argued that the pension law and a tax law enacted at the same time are together "substantially the same" as the "unconstitutional railroad retirement act of 1934."

The two separate acts, one providing pensions and the other taxing the income of railroads and employees, were passed last year after the Supreme court ruled unconstitutional the 1934 law in which a levy and a pension system were combined.

The government contended that the alleged relation between the two acts could not be proved, and that the railroads were suing, in effect, to enjoin collection of a tax. Such a suit, the government contended, was barred by federal law. The government further defended its railroad retirement system as an exercise of its constitutional power "to provide for the common defense."

POSTPONEMENT of action on the Patman-Robinson chain store bill until next session was urged on the house rules committee in a letter from six powerful farm organizations.

Charging the bill would restrict operations of farm co-operatives by preventing them from receiving wholesale discounts, the letter warned also that higher consumer prices would result from enactment. The measure, already passed by the senate, prevents price discriminations by manufacturers to big customers.

The letter was signed by representatives of the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, the National Co-operative Council, the National Co-operative Milk Producers' Federation, the Farmers' National Grain association, and the Northwestern Farmers' Union Legislative committee.

SECRETARY OF WAR DERN allocated nearly $138,000,000 for river and harbor improvement projects throughout the country that had been recommended by the engineering corps.

Of this sum, $103,458,839 will be used for entirely new waterway and port improvement while $34,408,150 will be employed in maintaining existing river and harbor facilities.

SIX members of the Supreme court of the United States ruled that the Guffey act to control the bituminous coal industry is invalid, and another of the New Deal experiments goes into the discard. This is the act which President Roosevelt urged congress to pass notwithstanding doubts of its constitutionality "however seasonable."

Sen. Guffey

Five justices—Sutherland, Butler, Van Devanter, McReynolds, and Roberts—joined in the majority opinion which invalidated the whole act. Justices Cardozo, Brandeis, and Stone joined in a dissenting opinion in which they upheld the act. Chief Justice Hughes held in a separate opinion that the act was constitutional with respect to the marketing provisions but unconstitutional with respect to the labor regulations.

The court in the majority opinion held that there is no authority in the Constitution for the control of the coal industry attempted in the Guffey act. The act was not valid either under the commerce clause or the welfare clause.

Senator Guffey of Pennsylvania, author of the act, lost little time in introducing a substitute measure, concentrating on price fixing and omitting the labor provisions which were outlawed by the Supreme court. John L. Lewis, head of the United Mine Workers, declared that organization would "join in requesting congress to enact the bill at once." He thought the measure would "operate to maintain the equilibrium of the coal industry pending further study of stabilization of the industry."

A plea to all coal operators to support the new bill was made by Charles O'Neill, legislative chairman of the National Conference of Bituminous Coal Producers.

Some congressional leaders, however, thought it unlikely that the new Guffey bill could be passed at this session.

HERBERT H. LEHMAN announced suddenly in Albany that he would not be a candidate for a third term as governor of New York, saying: "I feel the time has come when I may ask release from the cares and responsibilities of the governorship." But leaders of the Democratic party, including President Roosevelt, National Chairman James A. Farley and Senators Wagner and Copeland undertook to persuade Mr. Lehman to run for reelection. They all agreed that his retirement would be a loss to the state and the party and that he should be "drafted."

Gov. Lehman

The immediate political result of the governor's surprise action was that New York again became a doubtful state for the presidential campaign, in the minds of many politicians. The morale of Republican leaders in the state improved, and Democrats began speculating as to which of a group of five or more candidates could be groomed for the gubernatorial nomination this fall if Lehman persisted in his determination.

GENERAL rejoicing marked the inaugural of Dr. Miguel Mariano Gomez as president of Cuba—the first elected by the people since Gerardo Machado. The new executive, a lawyer and revolutionary leader who has twice been mayor of Havana, took the oath of office in the ball room of the president's mansion in the presence of 400 foreign and Cuban officials. The guns of Cabanas fortress across the harbor fired a twenty-one gun salute and on the signal all public buildings were illuminated and thousands of merry-makers began parading the streets.

President Gomez appeared on a balcony and told the shouting throngs that he would do his best to maintain a constitutional government "by the Cubans and for the benefit and interest of all Cubans." In his first message to congress he assured the nation that personal rights would be respected. Among his policies he listed "ample tolerance to all ideas, ample guarantees for all rights and sufficient energy to maintain order and the necessary strength against offenders against the laws."

NEITHER Great Britain nor France has any intention of paying the installments on the American war debt due June 15. And almost certainly, all the other debtor nations except Finland will follow the example of the two big ones and again default. British Foreign Minister Eden talked about the debts with Leon Blum, who probably will be premier of France soon, but there was no indication that either one was planning to make a payment. Blum told the American club in Paris he hoped the war debt "misunderstanding" might be cleared up, but he was just trying to be pleasant to the people of both America and France without spending any money.

Of course the debtor nations would like to have the issue cleared up, for as long as they are in default they are subject to the restrictions of the Johnson act which makes it unlawful for any person in the United States to purchase or sell the bonds, securities or other obligations of any foreign government or to make any loans to such a government while that government is in default in payment of its obligations to the United States.

BENITO MUSSOLINI advised Prince von Starhemberg of Austria not to start any domestic trouble because he was ousted from the cabinet by Chancellor Schuschnigg, and when the prince returned to Vienna the cabinet fixed things up neatly by decreeing that the country should have three fuehrers. Schuschnigg, the unofficial dictator, becomes national leader of the fatherland front; Eduard Baar von Barenfels, the new vice chancellor, is national commander of the front militia; and Starhemberg continues as sports leader and head of the Northerhood Protective association.

NATIONS that are especially hard up might consider the method said to be employed by Rumania. A Bucharest newspaper asserts that government employees have been paid largely in counterfeit money, vast quantities of bogus 100 lei pieces having been issued in sealed bags by the ministry of finance. That ministry then announced that the counterfeit coins would not be redeemed and that persons who passed them would be prosecuted.

THE resettlement administration headed by Rexford Guy Tugwell was declared by the District of Columbia court of appeals to be "clearly unconstitutional delegation of power," in a case involving a model community project in Somerset county, New Jersey.

Going beyond the issue before them, the justices of the Appeals court called the entire relief appropriations act of 1935 into question. The act was invalid and hence RA was invalid, according to the court. Legally, however, none of the rest of the act will be affected by the decision because the other multitudinous activities of the New Deal under the appropriation were not before the court.

DR. ANTON PAVELIC, alleged leader of Ustashi, the Croatian terrorist organization, and accused as one of the "master minds" in the assassination of King Alexander of Jugoslavia in Marseilles, has been set free by the Italian authorities. Released with him was his lieutenant, Eugene Kvaternik. The two were arrested at Turin in October, 1934, soon after the murder of Alexander, but the French authorities who were working on the case were never permitted to question them and an Italian tribunal refused the request of the French government for their extradition to France for trial.

JOSE LUIS TEJADA SORZANO was forced to resign the presidency of Bolivia by a junta of army officers and Socialists who staged a bloodless coup d'etat in La Paz. Col. German Busch, acting chief of the general army staff, leader of the coup, will be at the head of the government until Col. David Toro, hero of the war with Paraguay, returns from the Chaco, when Toro will be installed as president.

NEWS that Japan was greatly enlarging her force in North China led the State department in Washington to announce that the position of the United States is the same as that outlined last December by Secretary Hull affirming its support of the nine power pact that guarantees China's territorial integrity. At that time Mr. Hull said this country has a binding faith in the fundamental principles of its traditional policy. This government adheres to the provisions of the treaties to which it is a party and continues to bespeak respect by all nations for the provisions of treaties solemnly entered into for the purpose of facilitating and regulating, to reciprocal and common advantage.

At the State department it was said that the reaffirmation of support of the nine power pact does not mean that the administration will abandon its policy of declining to take the initiative in any attempt to curb Japan for violations of the pact. This was attempted by Henry L. Stimson, secretary of state in the Hoover administration, with the gain of nothing but Japanese ill will.

MRS. SARA DELANO ROOSEVELT, aged mother of the President, fell while on a visit in New York some days ago and is laid up at Hyde Park with an impacted hip and cracked bone. She made light of the injuries but Mr. Roosevelt was gravely concerned. He spent the week-end with his mother.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

FAMOUS WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington. — The Passamaquoddy tidal power and Florida ship canal projects have won a reprieve from the congressional death sentence. It was the first sign of Presidential maneuvering to get the approval of congress for the two projects dumped on Capitol Hill's doorstep last January by the President, and treated so cavalierly by Mr. Roosevelt ever since.

Whether it is the real breath of life or a mere reprieve will depend upon critics of the two projects. They can talk the resolution to death if they wish, unless all hope of adjournment is thrown to the winds. Incidentally there is nothing the Republicans in the senate would rather talk about than Quoddy and the Florida canal. They know they are on safe ground—that the country regards both projects as a waste of public money—and that public reaction was so strong against them that even the overwhelmingly Democratic house and senate had to vote them down.

If the resolution just introduced by Senator Joseph T. Robinson is passed, there is very little doubt as to what will happen. It provides that a board of three engineers is to be appointed to study each project, and to report to the President on June 20 or before, this year. If they report the projects to be "justified," the President, under the resolution, would then have the approval of congress to allot ten million dollars for the Florida canal and nine million dollars for Quoddy out of work relief funds.

All the members of the board are to be engineers who have not in any way been connected with either project. They would be appointed by the President and receive $50 a day plus expenses for each day of service.

Causes Surprise

Critics of the project were surprised at the resolution, though it has been intimated at the White House that some new plan would be worked out for Quoddy. There had been no such hint about the Florida canal.

Senator Duncan U. Fletcher of Florida has been watering the White House as well as the senate office building with his tears in behalf of the canal, while Governor Louis J. Brann has been talking grimly to the President and James A. Farley about what would happen in Maine's September election if Quoddy were simply dropped overboard by the administration.

Democratic senators in New England were inclined to think that the move to revive both projects was just a political gesture, aimed at pleasing Fletcher and getting Brann in a good humor.

It was pointed out, however, that the Maine voters were rather practical, and that if the resolution were allowed to die because not enough White House steam was turned on they just might resent it.

Another possibility of course is that the engineers, if told by the President before he appoints them that they are not to worry about pleasing anybody, but shall report their own convictions, may bring in an adverse report, thus agreeing with all the previous studies made of Quoddy. An adverse report would provide ample justification for not going ahead.

This view is held by those senators who have thought for some months now that the President had finally been convinced by Harold L. Ickes and others that Quoddy was a pure waste of money, and that Mr. Roosevelt's reference of the whole matter to congress had just been a way out. Especially, they point out, as he did not ask any administration support of the projects when they were under consideration.

Tax Lawyers Busy

Washington's long array of tax lawyers, the men who fight to keep taxpayers from being forced to pay what the bureau of internal revenue insists upon taking, almost regardless of the law and the precedent, have been booked almost solidly from now on. In many instances their services are to start with the passage of the present tax bill.

Incidentally they are advising clients to postpone any move toward reorganization. Numerous incidents where reorganizations, mergers or other forms of change in the corporate structure were desired have been put off until after the passage of the tax bill.

Dependence on the tax lawyers strikes some of these very lawyers as rather amusing at the moment. Two of the most successful told this correspondent that they could not make out the foggiest idea of what many of the provisions mean.

But at present no one has the slightest idea what the tax bill will be like when it becomes law. The senate is working on it. That's all anyone knows. How far they will go in making the meaning of any given section clear is another.

All of which piles on top of one of the most annoying problems business has to contend with—the attitude of the internal revenue legal department, headed by Robert H. Jackson.

It is best illustrated by a remark of Judge Morris A. Soper, of the Circuit Court of Appeals at Baltimore. A case was being heard where the complaining company said that the board of tax appeals paid no attention to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on certain questions.

Another justice on the Circuit court commented on this statement in a brief—as filed by a Washington tax lawyer.

Ignore the Courts

"H—m," he began. "We knew the board of tax appeals did not pay any attention to the rulings by this court, but we did not know it was also ignoring decisions of the Supreme court."

"Maybe," said Judge Soper, dryly, "they have been reading the Harvard Law Review."

Every lawyer in Washington knows that there is violent disagreement in policy between the lawyers of the Department of Justice and those of the bureau of internal revenue. As pointed out in a recent dispatch, Jackson's policy is to litigate, not to compromise.

One important case recently was decided against the government. Lawyers who had several different cases precisely on all fours, so far as they could see, were frankly informed that the government would not appeal, but that it would not regard the case as a precedent!

Which amounted, as Washington tax lawyers see it, to a concession by the bureau of internal revenue that if they were to take the case in question up to the Supreme court the government will lose again. Nevertheless, despite this obvious belief on their part, they would not compromise existing cases of a similar nature. They insisted upon making every claimant fight in the courts.

This is fine business for the tax lawyers. It makes big fees for them. For it is the big corporations that fight their cases through and do not have to surrender. All that hurts them is the expense.

But the little fellows with precisely similar cases, who do not feel that the game justifies the candle, have to pay. The expense to them of litigating, fighting up through the courts when the government appeals, would be greater than the tax the bureau of internal revenue is seeking unjustly to force them to pay.

La Follette's Plan

The most amazing thing about the senate's fumbling around on the tax bill is that the one man, who down in his heart comes closest to agreeing with all the Roosevelt doctrines, is the one who is fighting for a tax plan which probably would be the most disastrous to the New Deal in November.

This is Senator Robert M. LaFollette of Wisconsin. His proposal, which is causing so much concern at the White House and among the brain trusters, is to boost income tax levies on individuals getting less than $50,000 a year, all the way down the line, and to reduce the present exemptions so that millions of additional persons would be obliged to pay income taxes, and all those now paying a small income tax would have to pay more.

LaFollette is for this proposal for two reasons. He wants the government to keep on taking in enough revenue to be able to keep on with its social reform, farm relief, and other Progressive policies. He believes that this is the only way to bring in enough money. He knows, and so do practically all the senators—only many of them would not think of admitting it publicly—that the bill as passed by the house will not produce the expected revenue. And he knows also that if its rates were so boosted that it would, the result would be a rather long-drawn-out, but nevertheless effective killing of the goose that lays the golden egg.

Further, he knows that if this last idea is wrong—if the corporations by one device or another are able to weather the storm—it will just be because they are able to work out some way or another to pass the tax on to the consumer anyhow.

The Alternative

Hence Senator La Follette is deadly serious when he says that congress will either accept his boosting in taxes on small incomes or be compelled eventually to tax food. Especially as La Follette knows also that the present measure, even if changed so as to actually produce the revenue the treasury says it must have, still falls very far short of balancing the budget. There must be a tremendous increase in taxes after election in order to have the government taking in as much money as it pays out.

Of course every other senator knows this, too, but most of them are confining their remarks to other subjects. Certainly Senator La Follette is the only pro-New Deal senator who is even whispering about the need for greater revenue, and honestly looking about to determine from what sources it could be obtained.

Almost without exception the senators going along with the administration on the bill are simply doing a chore. They know the present structure will not raise the money needed. Many of them privately agree that the bill is apt to do a great deal of harm. Many a senator who will vote for the measure is telling friends he is afraid it will result in steering the ordinary business cycle in the direction of more violent ups and downs, with better booms and worse depressions, encouraging reckless spending in good years, and forcing devastating economies in bad years.

Two New Deal Upsets

Round Trips to Europe

Big news from the Supreme Court of the United States and the United State Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Two "far-reaching experiments" of the Roosevelt New Deal are declared unconstitutional.

Arthur Brisbane

The Supreme court in a sweeping decision killed the Guffey coal act; the District of Columbia Court of Appeals held the Resettlement Administration under Professor Tugwell violates the fundamental law of the land."

The decisions set forth that "these major experiments in socialization involve unlawful delegation of powers vested in congress and violation by the federal government of the rights of the states," the Washington dispatch avers.

The resettlement decision affected only that part of the relief activities under Professor Tugwell's administration, leaving undecided the remainder of the $4,800,000,000 voted to the President last year.

Much of the resettlement money has been spent and much more allocated, cancellation of which will raise problems.

At Angels Camp, Calif., 25,000 persons watched the annual Calaveras county frog-jumping contest and saw "Can't Take It" cover a distance of 12 feet 8 inches in three hops. Another frog, raised on the ranch of the late Will Rogers, was second, with 12 feet 2 inches.

Twenty-five thousand human beings watched some frogs hop; not half as many would have gathered to hear Einstein lecture on relativity.

It is suggested that every American be compelled to go to school until twenty-two years of age to cut down the competition for jobs.

It might be simpler to keep everybody in school until sixty and then give everybody a pension of $200 a month. What could be simpler than that?

The average sensible American starts making a living long before he is twenty-two and would do well to continue on that basis.

Sir Hubert Wilkins, who has flown in the Arctic, Antarctic and other queer regions by plane, crossed the Atlantic by dirigible recently.

Says Sir Hubert:

"From almost anywhere in the United States, a business man could spend Wednesday and Thursday going about his business, catch the dirigible by airplane Thursday midnight, spend two business days in Europe and be at his desk the early part of the next week."

Prof. Raymond Moley says it was easier for Mussolini to conquer "muddy thinking" in the League of Nations than it will be to "prevail over the mud of Ethiopia in months to come."

New York police arrested a middle-aged woman begging near a church and "acting strangely." She wore men's shoes, five dresses, one over the other, and carried bank books showing deposits of $25,000.

This should not discourage wise charity. Not every old woman, begging, has four extra dresses and $25,000. But it might well discourage thoughtless, indiscriminate giving, which encourages professional beggary and causes young beggars to graduate as criminals.

Following an old Roman custom, Mussolini is taking a census of the Ethiopians that remain. The total number is between six and fourteen millions. Exact figures are wanted.

The able-bodied will be put to work, plows, spades and shovels supplied by Mussolini, with Italians telling the Ethiopians where and what to dig. That need not horrify us, for it is what we have been doing in this country for a long time. It will be better for the Ethiopians than killing and selling each other into slavery.

Americans ask three questions: "What is the news? Who won the game? Have you heard the story about —?" For that reason, the successful newspaper pays attention first to the news, told accurately and vividly, then it concentrates on sport, then on humor. Such dry things as opinions, editorials, books, in the rear. Fiction ought to be number four, but good fiction is scarce and the other kind not worth printing.

Anti-religious hatred persists in Spain. While Pope Pius in Rome was addressing representatives of Catholic newspapers, deploring Communism and the Hitler attitude toward the Catholic church and the Catholic press, a Spanish mob in Valencia was burning two Catholic churches, beautiful monuments of early days. Former indifference to religion has turned to actual hatred in many countries, and in those that were most deeply religious.

In a flash I had fired and had drawn his fire, for, before I could think, a bullet had flicked the sleeve of my pistol-arm.

This showed me, once for all, that so far as snap shots were concerned, I stood no chance whatever against such a man. As I whipped to one side, I made up my mind that I must not fire again until I knew for certain that my bullet was going to kill. In a word, if I was to win, I must come to close quarters with Pharaoh, if not to grips.

I had now come back to the table, and an instant later I was crouching beneath the archway, with my pistol on the carpet before me and my empty hands outstretched upon either side.

I had not long to wait.

When I did not return his fire, I fancy the man was uncertain whether or not I was dead. He, therefore, sought the spot from which I had fired and, finding nobody there, turned and came to the table exactly as I had done.

And exactly as I had done, he began to edge his way round it. . . .

The slack of his trousers brushed my hand.

In a flash I had him by the ankles and, ripping his feet from beneath him had brought him down on his side. Then I snatched up my pistol, thrust it into his stomach and pressed the trigger—in vain.

The magazine was empty. Slovenly to the last, Rush had never troubled to replenish his clip.

Pharaoh had fallen to his right and so on his pistol-arm. While this was taking his weight, he could not aim, and though in a flash he had flung his weight to the left, in that instant my fingers had caught the wrist of his pistol-hand. For a moment he fought for his freedom: then he let himself fall on his back: but now my wits were working and before it could reach his pocket, I had hold of his other wrist.

And in that instant the room was flooded with light. . . .

For a moment I thought that someone had entered the chamber. And then I guessed that Pharaoh had turned the switches when first he came into the room, that the switchboard itself might report the repair of the damage which he had done.

So for the first time that night I saw my enemy's face.

I think he must have known that I was his assailant, but the sight of me seemed to send him out of his mind. He fought no more as a serpent, but like the madman he looked, his face convulsed with passion and his eyes starting out of his head.

At last, to my relief, the tempest blew itself out, and he lay back, spent and panting, to take his rest: but, before I could think of moving, he had lifted his head once more and was staring into my eyes.

I looked back, grimly enough.

He did not struggle: he simply gazed upon me, as though he would brand my image upon his memory. Then the fellow spat in my face.

So a madman made a madman.

If he resisted, I know not, but I used him as a lay figure from that time on.

I dashed his hand on the massive plinth of the table, to break his wrist, and when his pistol had fallen I brought his hands together and got to my knees. And then I was clear of the table and had jerked him up to his feet.

I let his broken wrist go, whipped out his second pistol and pitched it across the room.

Then I seized his throat with both hands, turned him back to the table, bent him across its corner and broke his back on the oak.

* * * * * * * *

Sitting on the bench by the fireplace, I wiped my face and my hands on Helena's black silk scarf. This had been wrung and creased, and I had no doubt that Pharaoh had used it to gag her, before he had carried her off.

Now that the business was over, I found it hard to believe. I looked at my watch.

The time was twenty minutes past twelve. Not an hour had gone by since Pharaoh had 'talked' from the ramparts and Dewdrop had read his message to Rush and Bugle and me. And now they were all four dead, but I was alive.

The reflection brought me up to my feet.

Alive, if you please: but I was shut in a chamber from which I could see no way out. . . .

For twenty minutes I sought that secret door. I shouted and beat upon the woodwork, using Helena's name—all in vain.

Helena was locked in the turret—my hand in my pocket fingered her master key: which I had taken from Rush, but the turret, no doubt, had embrasures, and she would be found and released so soon as she could make herself heard. She had, of course, heard the firing, but if the thieves were fighting what did that matter to her? Let Pharaoh revenge her escape upon Bugle and Rush: or seek to blast his way out of the secret room. (Here perhaps I should say that though Helena heard the firing, the sound was so muffled that she could not be sure what it was, while, so thick were the walls of Yorick, that nobody else in the castle heard it at all.)

Now when Helena's release was effected and Geoffrey and the warden were found, the three would take counsel together upon her report. The position would be considered—but not for long.

The thing was clear. To open the room would be madness. The council would surely decide that Pharaoh and his companions must be left to die where they were.

Something dazedly I surveyed my surroundings.

No windows, no doors. How did one get out of chambers that had neither windows nor doors?

It was then that I thought of the fireplace.

A grate must have a chimney; and if the chimney was wide. . . .

I must have climbed forty feet when my hand encountered a ridge and I felt a current of air. And then I came to a fireplace.

My Pistol on the Carpet Before Me.

As I crawled out of that fireplace, I knew where I was. I had come to Helena's bedroom.

Roughly I washed the filth from my head and my hands, but though I did what I could to wipe the soot from my shoes, I very soon saw that until I could change my clothing, I should not be fit to move in a furnished room. And what clothes I had were at Plumage. . . .

At once to get to the farm became my burning desire.

Before I did so, I must set Helena free. That was simple enough. I had her master key, and there was her private stair to bring me down to the hall. And yet I dreaded the duty. I did not want to see her—at least, not now. I dreaded the explanations which I should be forced to give. I did not want her to know that I had been there, in that room: that I had seen Pharaoh break her, that I had heard her purchase my safety for ten thousand pounds a year.

I heard the whine of a dog and then the scratch of claws on the door that led to the ramparts. In a moment I had it open, and there to my joy was Sabre.

I afterwards learned that, perceiving the bustle above him, the dog had declared, by barking, that he was down in the moat. His rescue was effected.

The great dog seemed pleased to see me, but none too pleased to see that I was alone.

"Come and find her, Sabre," I said. "I know where she is."

The Alsatian started and stared. Then he bounded towards me, put his great paws on my shoulders and licked my face.

One minute later we stood in the little hall.

With the master key in my hand, I turned to the turret door. For a moment I hesitated. Then I took a deep breath, fitted the key to the lock and pushed open the oak.

Helena was not to be seen. Neither, for that matter, was Sabre. He had gone to join his mistress at the head of the turret stair.

I was wondering whether to follow or whether to wait where I was, when I suddenly saw that my duty to the lady was done.

The appearance of Sabre would show her that she was released. The way to her bedroom was open, and she had no need of escort, because the terror was laid.

With trembling fingers, I whipped the key from the lock of the turret door. Then I opened the door which gave to the winding staircase, passed through and locked it behind me with all dispatch. Five minutes later I crossed the moat by the footbridge and entered the tunnel which would bring me into the woods.

As I walked to Plumage, I remembered those terrible moments—how in her pride she had flung my puny efforts in Pharaoh's face and how in her fear and trembling she had sought to buy my safety by committing a breach of trust. No queen could have done more for the king she loved.

Although I had come to regard with increasing apprehension the opening of Helena's eyes—to the truth, of course, that it was I and not Bugle that had stood in the secret chamber and had listened to all she said—it had never occurred to me that, if only I held my tongue, neither she nor anyone else need ever suspect that I had entered the castle that Friday night. Yet before my cousin had spoken a dozen words, I saw that, if I was careful, my secret would keep itself.

He found me finishing breakfast in his room at The Reaping Hook.

"Well, you have missed something," he said. "Let that be your punishment for deceiving three simple souls. Not that I blame you—this time. My lady had no right to treat you like that. I told her as much in the coupe. But she wouldn't listen to me. But that's by the way. You've missed—in a way we've all of us missed the most astounding show that ever was seen. Lady Helena saw a good bit—more than enough, I'm afraid." He threw himself into a chair. "Upon my soul, I don't know where to begin."

"What do you know?" I said.

"I feel sure," said my cousin, "that you will be glad to hear that your failure to arrive at the castle knocked the three of us flat. We couldn't assimilate the fact that simple, honest John Spencer had laid himself out to deceive us—and done it so devilish well. You certainly got your own back. Lady Helena was wild. 'I'd never have believed it of him,' she raged.

"Well, now that she was safe in the castle, I was only too glad of an excuse to get out, and so I announced that Barley and I would seek you without delay. She insisted that we should take Sabre and gave the dog his orders before we left. It's right you should know that she was extremely worried."

My cousin paused, to frown on his finger-tips.

"I hope, in the merciful course of time, to forget the way we employed the next two hours. We used Sabre exactly according to the instructions on the box. Should the dog display emotion, release him at once. Remain exactly where you were when he left you, until he returns. Then take hold of his collar and he will lead you to John."

I began to shake with laughter.

"Quite so," said Geoffrey. "Quite so. After about an hour the dog displayed emotion and was released. After another hour Barley and I displayed much more emotion and withdrew to survey the mouth of the entrance drive. . . .

"We hadn't been there ten minutes when we heard the Carlotta coming—coming from the castle all out. By the use of our torches we stopped her, to find that she was manned by a flying squad. Watchmen, porters, grooms—all of them armed to the teeth. They were going to compass Yorick, traveling east: and the coupe was coming after, to travel west. The Countess Helena had been kidnaped. Yorick was plunged into darkness and my lady was gone. Let down in a sheet from the ramparts. Her handkerchief had been found on the drawbridge and Sabre had been found in the moat."

I felt that it was time to say something.

"But how," I began. . . .

"Don't interrupt," said my cousin. "Listen to me. Well, I let the Carlotta go, deciding that Barley and I would do better on foot. I sent him east and ran west—yes, ran, with my heart in my mouth. The idea was to find the Rolls . . . if the Rolls had not gone.

"I found her at a quarter to one, up a little track—and very near cried with relief. You see, that meant that my lady was yet in the park.

"I rushed on and stopped the coupe, which was lapping for the twentieth time, told the chauffeur to go on patrolling, but to send me reinforcements and tell everybody he met. Then I went back to lay my ambush. I soon had plenty of men and I did the job well. Pharaoh simply hadn't an earthly. Though he didn't know it, that track had become the scaffold on which he and his little friends were going to die.

"At a quarter to two a wallah comes pelting with a message—we very nearly killed him, of course. But by the time he'd said his piece he was nearer death than before. The Countess Helena's compliments, and will Mr. Bohun come back to the castle at once."

My cousin covered his face.

"I don't think I've ever felt such a blasted fool. But blasted . . .

"Well, I took the Rolls and drove back—to hear Lady Helena's tale.

Ancient Indians of Peru Used Cone as a Sun Dial

A giant sun dial was used by the Incas to measure their seasons—the "Inti-huatana," or "place where the sun was tied." The shadow cast by the cone on the stone platform beneath formed the basis of the ancient Indian method of reckoning time.

The Inti-huatana in varying forms is found in many of the dead cities which have been unearthed in Peru. Cuzco, ancient capital of the Incas, is an archeological center.

The outstanding characteristic of Cuzco is its walls made of huge stones cut and fitted together in some mysterious manner without the use of sharp instruments, mortar or cement. Other ruins include stone seats, remnants of baths, archways and staircases; the famous Rodadero, a steep naturally grooved rock used by the Incas as a toboggan slide long before the Spaniards arrived; and the "Throne of the Inca," a rounded-off rock with steps cut into it on either side—the vantage point from which, it is said, the Inca and his engineers directed the construction of the fortress of Sacsahuaman.

Moon Madness

ONLY one jump from the sublime to the ridiculous—

Madia Thorne sat on the cement edge of the lily pool and trailed her fingers disconsolately in the water. Madia was forty, her plump curves proclaimed it, her fallen arches attested the fact vociferously.

But the soft dusky shadows were kind. An inquisitive goldfish swam near investigating the ripples her fingers made, but Madia didn't notice. Her eyes were glued to the lighted windows of the mansion through the trees. A masquerade dance was in full swing. The music wailed a low sweet cadence—a whispering sadness—there had been a time when Madia was young, but nine children and Jim Thorne—romance had all but perished in Madia's heart.

Madia and her husband, Jim Thorne, were caretakers at Emberly Lodge and tonight youth and beauty would hold high carnival; behind the silken masks chivalry would bloom again and gay Knights would woo their ladies fair—and tomorrow Madia would gather the dance programs so full—return a stray compact or two when she did the cleaning.

The low whine of a plaintive violin, the throbbing, poignant notes of a cello brought an ache, a trembling urge to be one of the gay throng; just for one mad night to dance in silver slippers and cobwebby hose and listen again to thrilling passionate words of love.

Madia's lips twisted in a bitter smile at the incongruity and her glance strayed to her thick ankles and her clean starched apron.

With a sigh of patient resignation she started to rise. Duty called. Perhaps she had lingered too long now. They would be needing her to serve the refreshments. But wait! One of the guests was approaching. A tall man in the guise of a laborer or tramp, if you please. A picturesque vagabond in worn trousers and flapping shirt sleeves, swinging jauntily along the graveled walk. He wore no mask, had perhaps put it aside for this moment of expected privacy, alone by the lily pool.

Madia moved as if to leave, but the stranger spoke: "Don't go! Stay and talk to me. I'm so lonely and this night wasn't made for loneliness." Then in a voice as subtly bewitching as the mellow strains, "It was made for love and loving."

With a courtly gesture, "Oh, fair lady, are you moon nymph or creature of my own imagination?" Without more ado he flung himself on the grass at Madia's feet, almost touching the hem of her voluminous skirts. His hair, whether real or artificial, was a mass of matted dark curls. Madia could have put out her hand and touched their fascinating tangle. Propped on an elbow, he nonchalantly lighted a cigarette and by its feeble glow Madia could have sworn the stubble on his cleft chin was real.

A tramp personified. Would that she were so artistically impersonated! A moon nymph! Creature of glamour and mystic moonbeams, slim as a fairy lance. Madia moved a trifle more in the shadow. Why shatter the illusion? Madia tipped the scales at two hundred and twenty-five.

But the stranger waited not for her answer; he continued more to himself than to her. At first he humbly begged the privilege of kissing the hem of her frilly apron, then growing bolder he covered her hands with the fiery famished kisses of a man half-starved for love. On bended knees he struck the attitude of a knightly Romeo—he was court jester—he was king. He was a man begging for understanding—for love.

And Madia, bewitched by his audacity, met the quaint daring with thrusts akin. She was maiden slim and coy—she was siren bold—she was woman pouring out her heart for romance.

When he took her in his arms she yielded and the scratch of his bearded lips sent shivers along her spine. Yet shame and humiliation overcame her. What had she done? Jim and the children! She tore herself from his arms and hurried away. Yet the stolen moment had been so sweet just for that mad thrill—to have some one understand, to know all the poignant longing of a woman's heart.

"Ah, but you will come again every night here by the fountain when the crescent moon rides high and the shadows lie heavy and deep. Say you will, my sweet," he pleaded. And Madia knew that she would. Together they would sail enchanted seas and go gypsy voyaging to castles in Spain.

Back in her little kitchen Madia had the fantastic sensation of a lovely dream, but her bright eyes and burning cheeks were only too real. Romance was not dead! Once again she had a lover, an adorable prince who loved her.

Madia busied herself 'til her husband came in.

"Well, how goes the party?" she asked casually.

"Oh, all right, I guess," lighting his pipe with weary indifference. "But one of the guests gave us the very dickens of a time. He was dressed like a tramp and we couldn't understand the ruction until the authorities showed up. They were hunting an escaped lunatic from the asylum. Funny fellow! He kept insisting that he had been making love to a moon nymph down by the lily pool!"

TIME TO SPRUCE UP

In ancient times in the city of Athens every man was admonished that the way to make the city "clean" would be for each to sweep infront of his own door. That excellent method still applies in our modern cities, and now the time has rolled around for every body to put it into practice. The day has come for raking and digging and beautifying the home premises. They may be easily made neat and attractive in appearance.Pruning and planting shrubs and laying out flower beds and getting ready for the annual miracle of Spring is an obligation that rests on all household.

Here we have one of the best proofs of good citizenships that brings home to all home lovers the unwritten obligation that rests on every resident of the community to make his own little plot of earth a more agreeable place in which to live and thereby add to the general embelishment of his home town for the pleasure of all. On account of the floods and rains home beautification has not gotten a good start this year, but there is ample time left for this important service.

HOLDING DOWN COTTON ACREAGE

Agricultural agents tell us that the cotton acreage in Shelby County will this year be approximately what it was last year. The plans are going forward as rapidly as the organization can be perfected to co-operate with the government's soil conservation program and take the farm acreage of the county away cotton and plant such crops as legumes and grasses and other kinds of soil-conserving crops instead.

President Roosevelt sometime ago issued a warning to Southern farmers not to increase cotton acreage this year in the face of a burdensome carry-over, and it is earnestly hoped the farmers and going to heed the goodadvice. A large cotton crop this year might produce tragic results in price declines. There is no assurance that the government will continue to "peg" the price, with the warehouses bulging with an enormous surrplus brought forward from other years. Ultimately the "breakdown" is bound to come. It is an old cry but the farmers must turn their attention to growing more feed crops, as the best insurance against a collapse of the cotton situation.

PRISON POPULATION INCREASE

Many towns and cities boast of their rapid growth, of their increase in population during certain periods of time. But no city of any importance can match the increase in prison population of the United States during the past decade. It has increased 100% for the ten year period ending on December 31, 1935.

Some may argue that the increase in crime is due to the depression, but there was an increase during the prosperous, such as 1927-28-29. Some may argue that the increase was due to prohibition, but the prison population continues to increase in states where prohibition has been repealed. More vigilant law enforcement cannot account for a 100% increase in prison population, if anyone advances that theory.

Court records show that either prosperity or poverty has much to do with criminal activities. The prison population is growing faster than the nation at large. It is high time that county, state and federal governments make a study of crime in this country and try to find out a remedy to minimize it.

A GOOD REASON

Russia has 3,000; France 3;400; Great Britian 3,200; Germany 2,800; Italy 2,500; Japan 200; United States 1,900. We merely give the above to show one of the reasons why these countries which were "bled white" by the war couldn't pay back their loans.

———:o:———

ECHOES FROM THE PAST

Government agents tracing the Lindbergh ransom money have accounted for all of it except $50. The fact that it all passed through Hauptman's hands convinces federal agents that he had no accomplices.

May God send His most Heavenly blessings to the pastor, our dearly beloved Rev. J. B, Johnson as he delivers his word of wisdom and praise for our Lord and Master, at the Baptist Church next week. Mr. and Mrs. Cecil Collins, one of the most charming young couples in Siluria, were visiting in Clanton over the week end.

Now just listen to what your snooping reporter has dug up. It seems that we are to have another parade of beauty, or maybe its personality I'm talking about. Anyway this parade is to come off some time in June. Quite a few of the girls from previous parades will be doing some of their fancy steps aeross the stage again. Among those we hope to see are such faces as Zola Moore, our 1935 prize winner of second place, and Jerry Kelly, who won third place. Let's also put in a plea here for some entirely new faces. Pleas dear committee, can't we have them.?

BROWSING WITH THE POETS

It is no small achievement to sponsor the creation of a poem—A Heart Song that becomes immortal! And, if poetry is, as Shelley defined it, "the record of the best and happiest moments of the happiest and best minds," then it is most appropriate that we observe with the Nation POETRY WEEK which began on Monday

By definition, a Poet is a maker, a creator—POETA, one who makes—and the product of his mind and heart is a new creation. Poetry and Music are LITERARY Siamese Twins. "And the song was found in the heart of a friend!" After all is not this the measure of a song's appeal—says Jessie Wilmore? It is the POEM that lives in the heart that is handed on to succeeding generations; not primarily because of a flawless technique, or beauty of diction, but because of its ability to satisfy some mutual hunger of the human heart.

Two great adventures common to the human race practically compose the germ of every poem written—LIFE—DEATH—the reality of the first—the finalty of the last! The stronger the appeal of the poem, the brighter the promise of splendid immortality. Kindred spirits read and understand this poetic code language which strikes a responding chord that may be vibrant or delicately attuned to the "emotional wave length with that of his fellowman." LOVE—LIFE—POETRY—MUSIC when perfectly attuned blend as beautifully as do the colors in a rainbow. May your ability to enjoy these ESSENTIALS for a happy existence never grow less! Observe National Poetry Week by reading from your favorite authors!

GOOD SPORTS!

After all is said and done, I believe that the great business of life lies in being a GOOD SPORT, says George Matthews, and we agree with him. "We all have misfortunes. We win today—we lose tomorrow. The wheel of fortune goes "round and round." It does not do any good to whine over misfortunes! Before us lie responsibilities which have to be met individually! Our privilege is to accept them as they are, not as we would have them. If we face LIFE as it is—that is quite enough to keep us busy. "We shall never be held accountable for what does not lie within us to change or modify.'

A Good Sport is an ispration on the Athletic field and to qualify as a good sport in the game of LIFE—and smile through its many mysterious, even terrifying disillusionments and experiences is to qualify as a genuine "good sport." In other words—IF you can play the game of life CHINS UP; IF you can TAKE IT and STILL come SMILIN' THRU—You ARE a good sport!

Mr. Ferris of Tupelo, Mississippi, is visiting his sister Mrs. Joel Chandler in Columbiana.

A meeting was held Tuesday after noon in Mr. Luck's office to discuss the possibility of sponsoring a playground in Columbiana. Those present at this meeting were: Mr. Luck Dr. Crawford, Mrs. Homer Walton, Mrs. Alvin Bird, Mrs Luther Curlee, Mrs. Riddle and Mrs Bruton Lyon.

ATTENTION! FARMERS!

Carl Cannon, Manager of the Farmers Seed Store, states unless more interest is manifested regarding the sour cream project which he has urged the Dairymen to take advantage of, he will have to discontinue his equipment especially installed for this particular phase of this useful and enterprising department in his store. Call on Mr. Cannon when in Columbiana and talk over the marketable value of the milk products required.

Miss Myrtle Miles of Birmingham spent the week end with her mother Mrs. John Miles. A distinguished guest whom her many friends are always delighted to welcome.

Gray Davis Goodwin, son of Mr. and Mrs. Gray Goodwin, is recuperating at home this week after undergoing a tonsil operation in Birmingham last week.

Miss Evans has accepted a responsible position with the Jefferson County Health Department.

"Getting by" Frank Norris without a "constructive suggestion" on the newspaper industry as an accomplishment. Last week, we happily welcomed Frank Norris, Editor for 45 years of the Peoples Advocate, into the office and he assured us he had absoutely no comment to make which did not carry his entire approval as far as last week's issue of the Democrat was concerned. Now—"Ain't that sumpin?"—Frank is the "Early Bird of Columbiana"—and maybe, the "Night Hawk" too. He can remember "way back when"—and can tell you also all the modern happenings of interest to folk whom you and we know. Pretty smart fellow too, and keeps up with FOLKS like "nobody's business"—And like the ELEPHANT—he never forgets anything or anybody! The "stranger within our gates" always meets "Frank" first, and a more accomodating citizen for the desired information, nor one more versatile—would be hard to find.

THE MOTORIST'S PRAYER

"Grant me a steady hand and watchful eye, that no man shall be hurt when I pass by," starts The Motorist's Prayer. The prayer first appeared in the London Church Times.

The Prayer is a reminder that good driving is a Christian obligation It follows:

Grant me a steady hand and watchful eye,
That no man shall be hurt when I pass by.

Thou gavest life, and I pray no act of mine
May take away or mar that gift of thine.

Shelter those, dear Lord, who bear me company,
From the evils of fire and all calamity.

Teach me to use my car for others need,
Nor miss through love of speed
The beauties of thy world; that thus I may,
With joy and courtesy go my way.

THE IDLER

And what is beauty to a hardened soul,
And what careth he for a smile?
He finds beauty in coins of gold,
And poker is his earthly child.

Slender oak leaves and a prancing breeze
Mean only the cool and the shade
And weep at the beauty of these,
All beauty that God has made.

My clothes are old and shoes worn thin,
For I idle the day away,
Watching an oak leaf in the wind.
And who dare say that I play?
—V. F.

A "Dreamer of Dreams" you call me. Idling my hours away. Did you see that silver sickle of a moon gleaming thru the tree tops last night? Did you make a wish over your left shoulder? Dare you call me an IDLER? If so, chase yourself a few moonbeams—and forget the "little cares of the week that have fretted you." Believe you me it is the best panacea for things you can't help—and those you find it difficult in being a "good sport about". I'm off for the week end. Thanks for following thru—and I shall hope to greet you next Thursday. In the mean time I shall be wishing you every happiness, the kind that warrants contentment in attainment.

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON,
Editor, Siluria, Ala.

NOTICE

Boys live in or around Pelham who are interested in organizing a Boys Scout Troop please meet at the Pelham school next Saturday night at seven o'clock. Willie Thomason will be there with a few of his boys to help us to organize a Scout Troop.
Ed Ennis, Pelham Ala.

That's right fellows. I will be there at seven o'clock sharp and I will be looking for every boy between the age of twelve and eighteen who lives anywhere within walking distance of Pelham. Ed Ennis is interested a great deal in the Pelham Community having a Boys Scout Troop and tells me that he believes all the boys who possibly can will be there.

I might also say that I would like to see a few men over the age of twenty one there who are intrested in this sort of work and would like to benefit the community by acting as Scoutmaster, Assistant Scoutmasters, Committeemen and Examining Committee.

Among the boys I am planning to bring along are John A. Kent and Troy Henderson Jr and two experienced Boy Scout Workers, John A. Ken tis the former Patrol Leader of the Bucks Patrol of Troop one. He showed so much interest and talent in his work that he was later named as Senior Patrol Leader. This is the highest office in a Troop that a minor Boy Scout is allowed to hold.

Troy Henderson, former Assistant Patrol Leader of the Bucks Patrol under the leadership of John A. Kent also showed an unusual amount of talent for this type of work and was later elected Patrol Leader.

In a new Troop these offices do not seem such an unusual honor. However, in a nolder Troop where all the boys know a great deal about this work, it is rather difficult to attain this honor with so many boys to compete with.

Let's give these boys a hearty pat on the back and wish them much success in all their undertakings concerning Boy Scout work

By the way, we might say a word here about the boys in and around Dogwood. I was in your community the other day and talked to some of the boys about the possibility of a Troop in your town. They were greatly interested in my plan. Can't some of you fellows get together and see what you can do about this and let me know when you plan to get started and I will try t be with you at your first meeting.

You fellows have a wonderful place for camping and it is within walking distance of town. I am speaking of Falling Rock Falls. This is one of the most beautful places I have ever visited.

For you who do not live near Dogwood, I will tell you something of the falls The rock forms a semi-circle, dropping back at the bottom to form a sort of cavern. The branch at the top falls out into the air and drops about a hundred or more feet to the ground To one side of the rock, you walk under the rock to the spring. Hold your cup above your head where the water runs out of the roof and fill your cup with some of the best water you have ever drank.

If you haven't already done so, I would suggest that you visit this place and see for your self.

Daytime Tailleurs of Net or Lace

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

ALMOST significant trend in current fashion is the preference shown for materials that are decidedly sheer. Not only does the employment of dainty sheers pertain to the evening mode but the real news lies in the fact of their outstanding vogue for practical daytime wear. From all style centers comes the persistent report of the supremacy of nets, laces, marquisettes, tulles, mousseline de soie and various other media of like character.

The fact that designers have taken to tailoring net as if it were a heavier material is providing one of the most exciting and fascinating ventures e'er recorded in the annals of fashion history. To refer to the new tailored net suits and ensembles as costumes of sheer delight is no mere play on words for they are just that—delightfully cool, sheer and smart as can be to wear on a late spring or a midsummer day.

A jacket suit strictly tailored of net in black, navy, Dubonnet red or any other dark color is about the neatest daytime fashion one could choose for immediate and summer wear. The net employed for these practical tailleurs is of an especially firm and dependable weave which, however, does in nowise detract from its sheer coolness.

Tailored frocks of printed net (many suits are also of net prints) are among the big successes of the season. A very handsome dress of plaid-patterned net is worn by the young woman seated in the group pictured. It is ideal to wear to an afternoon bridge party. In fact it is the dress-ideal for most any daytime social event where one hopes to look smartly gowned and to keep cool at the same moment. The sheer frill that enhances this dress is also an important style note for these frilly accents are inevitable this season if you would be chic. By all means have a printed net frock, it is exactly the sort that you will love to be wearing the whole summer through.

Lace for daytime wear has come definitely into its own this season. White cotton alencon makes up stunningly, as you will see by the swank gown to the left in the illustration. For all its tailored simplicity, it takes its place charmingly and definitely for afternoon wear and the cocktail hour. This attractive model features the newest silhoutte. It buttons demurely all the way down the front, and has a little stitched collar and cuffs of white linen. Lace has every advantage in tailored clothes, for it has pattern and texture in itself that allows for no extra trimmings or furbelows.

The tailored day dress centered in the group is as honest-to-goodness a product of the lace looms as the cobwebby laces and various cotton laces to which we have been accustomed. The dress is made of wool in one of the fabric lace types so much talked of this year. The colors are navy and gray with an accent of navy wool for the neckline and belt. Rosevienne of Paris is the creator of this high-style gown. The model wears it very smartly with a dark tulle Dache hat.

VEGETABLE COLORS DOMINATE STYLES

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Vegetable colors will dominate the summer styles, according to a fashion preview held in New York. Rhubarb pink, wax-bean, parsley green, red cabbage and garden blue (bluebonnet) were shown in every gown or its accessories. Hats were all in color, contrasting with the gown.

Two organza frocks for lunching in town indicated that dark sheers will replace prints for summer wear. With a black organza tunic dress was worn a large Swiss hair hat in rhubarb pink, with black streamers at the back. Gloves in rhubarb and nail polish in rose, carried out the color of the hat.

The ensemble that won the biggest hand was a bicycle culotte of Mt. Airy cloth. Beautifully tailored and practically wrinkle-proof, this new fabric made its formal bow to the world of fashion. Under her pert, tiny straw fedora, the model wore a light tan make-up and rust nails and lips carrying out the off-red tone of her belt and scarf.

Coats shown for travel were of tweed or lightweight wool with exaggerated shoulders. Long coats were fitted at the waist; swagger, boxy models were finger length. Particularly effective was a swagger top-coat in red cabbage over a navy suit. The mannish line of the large rolled straw fedora was softened by a veil, both in navy. Shoes and bag were navy, and ruby lips and nails carried out the purple red tone of the coat.

Prints Are Designed for Girls Who Take to Golf

The golf-minded girl may carry a country club course on her back this season, if she keeps an eye on the new prints which manufacturers are introducing. Topping the list for novelty patterns introduced this season is the fairways print, ornamented with an entire 18-hole golf course. Designers also have taken inspiration from sea and sky to introduce figured cottons and silks containing piscatorial prints and the sign of the zodiac.

Paris Approves Green

"Kelly green" is much used by Parisian dressmakers as a color accent in mid-season clothes. It is generally combined with black or with black and white, and is most often used at the neckline.

DARK BLOUSE

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Wear a dark blouse with your light suit and be fashionable. Very smart folk are carrying out this edict by toning up their natural or white linen suits with blouses in navy, brown, black or Dubonnet red linen. The ensemble in the picture selected from among showings in the Chicago wholesale market district plays up the slogan now popular in fashion circles that three fabrics are better than one or even two for the spring and summer costume. In this instance the color of the blouse picks up the leading shade in the plaid of the jacket suit.

Handbags Like Hats Is Innovation for Summer

This summer might see you wearing your bag and carrying your hat because handbags that look like hats are the latest innovation for summer. An especially striking one is a flat, round purse in shiny black straw that suggests a pancake beret. It even has a bunch of vivid field flowers on the edge.

Winning applause is a big green straw bag fashioned like a floppy garden hat that hangs over your arm with ribbons.

Youthful Authors Most Successful in "Best Seller" Race

Enduring Books Written by Authors Under 44

ATHENS, OHIO.—Best sellers are most frequently written by young writers between forty and forty-four years old, Dr. Harvey C. Lehman, of Ohio University, here, told a meeting of the psychology section of the Ohio Academy of Sciences.

When Doctor Lehman speaks of best sellers, he does not mean those works that flare into popularity for a period only to fade out like a rocket or a hit-of-the-week song. He means those books that have sold in enormous quantities over a long period of time. "In His Steps," for example, published in 1896 by a Kansas minister, Charles M. Sheldon, is said to have sold more than 20,000,000 copies. And it is estimated that 50,000,000 copies of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" have been sold.

"Such best sellers are books that make a very strong appeal to humanity in general," Doctor Lehman said. "In many instances they are books which appeal strongly to children and to semi-literates."

Women's Peak Earlier.

Books judged by critics to be among the world's best are also most likely to be written by authors between forty and forty-four, Doctor Lehman found.

Women writers are likely to publish their greatest works at a somewhat earlier age. Their peak is reached between thirty-five and thirty-nine.

This does not mean that beyond that age authors lose their ability to do creative writing. Good books are often written by writers of advanced age. Goethe was over eighty when he published the second part of the great "Faust." But such occurrences are the exception rather than the rule.

No Age Limit.

"Best books have, of course, been published by authors of almost every chronological age level beyond early youth," Doctor Lehman said. "Literary masterpieces of the first rank have been published most frequently, however, by men who were not beyond their forties. The age curves suggest that it would be highly absurd to attempt to establish a dead line."

World's Oldest City Had Huge War Tower Described in Bible

PHILADELPHIA. — Imagine the same warfare tactics used for three thousand years!

It is hard to believe in this age of inventive speed.

That time amazingly stood still in this way in ancient Bible lands is revealed by latest excavations at that famous site, "the oldest city in the world," Tepe Gawra in Mesopotamia.

Searchers Find Ruins.

A joint expedition of the University museum, University of Pennsylvania, and the American School of Oriental Research at Baghdad, has found ruins of a big round temple-tower at Tepe Gawra. The sweep of an almost perfect circle of brick foundations 60 feet in diameter has been unearthed. Outlines of 17 rooms can be traced. This big round house was built about 4000 B. C.

The field director of the expedition, Charles Bache, identified this as a fortress because of thick walls, single entrance, and stone weapons still lying in some of the rooms. It has temple features, too, suggested by the plan of the central rooms with an inner sanctum.

Turn to Bible.

The discovery turns archeologists to Bible history, where King Abimelech's wild and warlike reign ended in a fight at just such a temple-tower. That happened in Palestine, a little over a thousand years before Christ.

New Job for Pituitary Gland Found by Science

BOSTON.—Discovery of a new activity of the pituitary gland and possibly of a new pituitary hormone was reported by Dr. David Perla of New York city at the meeting of the American Association of Pathologists here.

The new hormone from the powerful but tiny gland in the head stimulates the spleen, red blood cell forming organ of the body. The spleen is endowed with enormous recuperative powers, so that when a part of it must be removed because of disease, or is damaged, the organ regenerates itself, forming new spleen tissue to replace that lost.

Body Tells Tales About Its Owner's Emotional Upsets

"Organ Jargon" Is Clue in Discovering Ailments

THE human body sometimes turns tattler and tells tales that its owner would never reveal by word of mouth. Such tale-telling, in which the internal organs are spokesmen, is described by a psychiatrist, Dr. Douglas Gordon Campbell of the University of Chicago in a report in a recent issue of the Canadian Medical Association Journal.

"Organ jargon," Doctor Campbell calls this tale-telling, quoting from the Viennese psychiatrist, Dr. Alfred Adler. This does not mean the kind of "organ recitals" sometimes indulged in at sewing circles when the conversation turns to operations, gallbladders and appendixes.

"Organ jargon" is what goes on in certain perplexing ailments for which the physician can find no material cause and no successful medicines. These ailments, it is estimated, make up two-thirds or more of all the cases coming to practitioners and general clinics.

Organs Are Affected.

The patients complain of a too rapid pulse, or of digestive disorders or impairment of sexual function. Yet careful examinations show that there is nothing wrong with the organs complained of except that they are not functioning normally.

As Doctor Campbell sees it, they are telling tales of social or emotional disturbances that the patient fails to put into words. The organ jargon is a "kind of language by which a patient expresses his attitude to some problem of social adjustment confronting him."

"Moods" Cause Trouble.

The social adjustment may be caused by the loss of money or the birth of a child who takes from the patient his or her accustomed place in the spotlight of family attention.

Whatever the adjustment, it causes emotion in the patient. Some experience emotion as a "mood"—a so-called psychic experience, Doctor Campbell explains. Others experience an emotional reaction which is a physiological experience.

Valuable Finds in Astronomy Made by Amateur Students

WASHINGTON.—The fascination of amateur astronomy lies, in no small part, in the possibility that one may make original contributions to the oldest of sciences. In August, 1933, a British vaudeville performer, Will Hay, discovered a remarkable white spot on the planet Saturn.

And a Japanese melon patch worker in California, Masani Hagata, received a medal from the Astronomical Society of the Pacific in 1931 for his discovery of a new comet. Both men were amateur astronomers observing with their own small instruments.

Mr. Hay, fellow of the Royal Astronomical society, who takes the role of a mirth-provoking schoolmaster as his routine stage skit, has just written a book, "Through My Telescope," which tells in simple language some of the facts of astronomy which most people want to know.

New Stars Found.

Sir Richard Gregory, editor of the most famous of all British science journals, Nature, writes the foreword to Mr. Hay's new book.

Says Sir Richard in part:

"Some of the most interesting discoveries in astronomy have, indeed, been made by non-professional observers, who may only be called amateurs if the term is rightly understood to mean people who take up a subject voluntarily, but not that their work is superficial or defective in the sense of being amateurish.

"Professional astronomers are so closely concentrated upon routine work that new celestial objects or phenomena are often first detected by voluntary observers."

One-Man Movie Theater Invented by New Yorker

WASHINGTON.—A one-man motion picture theater, which could be completely operated by a single attendant, including ticket selling, the making of change, taking the admission fee, and working the projecting machine, is described in a patent (No. 2,032,410) granted here to A. N. Goldsmith of New York city.

By a novel arrangement, the conventional ticket booth would also become the projecting room in which one person could run the whole "show." Use of fireproof film would be used to eliminate the fire hazard. The film would be of small size so that a complete two-hour show would be contained on a single reel. This eliminates the need for two or more projecting machines usually required where larger film is used, says the inventor.

The two-in-one booth is for use only in the "little theater" or small theater of restricted seating capacity, which charges but a small admission fee. It apparently is not intended to compete with or replace the regular motion picture theaters.

Lesson for May 31

THE LAST SUPPER

LESSON TEXT—Luke 22:7-23.

GOLDEN TEXT—This do in remembrance of me.—Luke 22:19.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Supper Jesus Gave His Friends.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Lord's Supper.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—What the Lord's Supper Means to Me.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—What the Lord's Supper Meant to Jesus.

The last meal that Jesus ate with his disciples was the Passover, the memorial of the national deliverance which pointed to the supreme deliverance to be effected by Christ on the cross of Calvary. In connection with this Passover, the feast of the new covenant was instituted. This feast also has a double import. It looks backward to the great deliverance wrought through Christ's atoning death, and forward to the even greater deliverance which He shall accomplish at his second coming (I Cor. 11:26).

I. The Last Passover (vv. 7-18).

1. The Passover prepared (vv. 7-13).

a. As the time had arrived for the killing of the Passover, Jesus directed Peter and John to make ready for it (v. 8).

b. The disciples inquired (v. 9) where they should prepare the Passover. Doubtless, they were eager to be of service to their Master and Lord.

c. Jesus gave strange directions (vv. 10-12), that they should go into the city, where they would find a man bearing a pitcher of water. The custom was for women to carry the water. This unusual occurrence would make it the easier for them to recognize the man of whom they would ask, "Where is the guest chamber where I shall eat the Passover with my disciples?"

d. The disciples gave unquestioning obedience (v. 13), not permitting the unusual instructions to raise the question of sanity or reasonableness. Jesus, because he was omniscient, knew just how the matter would turn out, and the disciples found it even so.

2. The Passover eaten (vv. 14-18).

a. The historic group around that table (v. 14) was composed of Jesus and the Twelve, the apostles.

b. Jesus' words to the disciples (vv. 15-18).

(1) "I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer" (v. 15). He desired to show them the meaning of the passion through which he was to go. He also craved their human sympathy as he passed through this terrible ordeal.

(2) "I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God" (v. 16). His death was the antitypical fulfillment of the Passover meal. He declared that this would be the last time that they could share together this sacred ordinance before the completion of his mediatorial work.

(3) "Take this cup and divide it among ourselves" (vv. 17, 18). By the token of the cup the disciples were partaking of the shed blood. This cup should be distinguished from the cup of the feast of the new covenant.

II. The Feast of the New Covenant (vv. 19, 20).

This feast took place at the close of the pascal supper.

1. The bread a symbol of Christ's body (v. 19). As bread nourishes and strengthens our bodies, so Christ is food to our spiritual nature. Unless the body receives nourishment, it decays. Unless our souls feed upon Christ, we shall perish. Christ's giving the physical bread to his disciples signified the giving of himself to them.

2. The cup a symbol of Christ's blood (v. 20). He said, "This cup is the new testament in my blood which was shed for you," indicating that each one must personally accept the atonement made by the shedding of his blood.

III. The Treachery of Judas (vv. 21-23).

1. The time of its manifestation (v. 21). It was while they were eating the last Passover that Jesus made announcement of the betrayal. Perhaps Jesus was in this manner offering Judas an opportunity at this last moment to repent.

2. The betrayal was by the determinate counsel of God (v. 22, cf. Acts 2:23). Nothing takes place by chance. Even the sinful acts of wicked men come within the permissive providence of God. This does not, however, lessen the guilt of sinners, for Jesus said, "Woe unto the man by whom he is betrayed."

3. The sorrowful question (v. 23). That the disciples were not suspicious of one another is evident from the personal nature of the question they asked, "Lord, is it I?" (Matt. 26:22). Well may each believer ask if he is in any way betraying his Savior and Lord.

True Happiness

Genuine happiness is the delicate perfume of a holy life. The sanctified soul exhales happiness as the flowers emit sweet odors. Heaven is a tropical garden of conscious spirits and its atmosphere is laden with happiness as the normal product of their purity.—D. C. Knowles.

A Purpose in Life

Have a purpose in life, and having it, throw into your work such strength of mind and muscle as God has given you.

Sunlight Beats Strongest on Tops of High Mountains

Sunlight beats most strongly at the tops of high mountains, where hardy climbers find it impossible to get warm.

This paradox of solar physics was brought down from the heights of the Andes by an exploring party of the Smithsonian Institution headed by C. P. Butler, says Science Service. With instruments packed up steep trails, they found that the sunlight at the top of Mt. Aunconquilcha, almost 20,000 feet high, was nearly one-sixth greater than at sea level. Yet in the middle of the day the temperature hardly rose above the freezing point.

Cardui Helped Three Times

"I used Cardui, when a girl, for cramps, and it helped then," writes Mrs. Ike Wright, of Sealy, Texas. Next, after marriage, she reports having taken Cardui when she felt weak, nervous and restless before her children were born. And during middle life, it helped her again.

"I was miserable," she explains. "I did not have an appetite. I was very blue and upset. I remembered Cardui had helped me, so took it again and soon began to pick up. I ate and had more strength. I kept up the Cardui and did not have any more trouble. Is it any wonder that I recommend Cardui to all my friends?"

Thousands of women testify Cardui benefited them. If it does not benefit YOU, consult a physician.

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

A very usual thing happened to me last week. A young fellow came to me and asked how he would go about joining the Lone Scouts.

I know that it is not a customary thing for a person to speak of the usual things that happen to him, usually it is the unusual things that he is so anxious to have everyone know about. Nevertheless, I felt that I just must mention this before I forget all about it.

This little fellow that I am speaking of, also told me that he had been trying to see me for some time and talk to me about the possibilities of his joining the Lone Scouts.

This boys question and his interest impressed me a great deal. But that is not what I have in mind just at the present. The fact is that the boy gave me what I believe is a good idea to improve the Scout Column.

After I had told this young man what he wanted to know, I thought that there might be other boys who are readers of the column, who would like to ask some questions concerning Scouts.

I realize there are a number of boys who cannot talk to me personally. For these boys I have decided to start something similar to Dan Beard's Scouting Section. Whereby the boys might ask the questions that they would like to have me answer.

For those of you who have a question in mind, take a penny post card and write your question on it and send it to me. Your answer will appear in the next edition of the paper.

For example, here is a question that one of the Siluria boys asked some time ago.

Is Wm. D. Boyce, the publisher tha tbrought Scouting to America, still in the publishing business?

Forest Numan, Siluria.

Ans.—Yes, he publishes a magazine called the Chicago Blade and Ledger.

Its easy, isn't it? If you have a question to ask just shoot it right on in to the Column and if I can't answer it, I will pass it on to Uncle Dan.

Another thing, your question doesn't necessarily have to be concerning Scouts and it is not necessary for you to be a Scout. You might ask such questions as how to make certain things or where to obtain certain materials that you might need in some of your hobbies or projects.

I notice that we have another letter containing the Wilton Troop notes this week. I might compliment Winston Hogan, who happens to be the Column's most active correspondent, on the good work he is doing. We always look forward to Winston's letter and hope that he will keep up the good work he is doing.

Cotton Leaf Worms Break All Records

The cotton leaf worm this year broke all recent records for an early appearance in this country, reports the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine of Auburn, which states that a "half grown worm was found in that vicinity on May 23 and in 1934 on May 24. "Even these dates were unusually early for this pest that overwinters in the tropics and flies north into the United States during the summer," says the Bureau.

Last year the damage caused by the leaf worm was much greater than usual because of its early appearance and widespread distribution over the cotton belt. It was most numerous and most destructive in Texas, Oklahoma, and Arkansas, but infested practically all of the cotton belt before the end of the season.

The worm is a serious pest when it appears in large numbers early in the season before the crop is made.

DARGIN HOME DEMONSTRATION MEETS WITH MRS. BAKER

The meeting of the Home Demonstration Club of Dargin was held on Tuesday at 2 P. M. at the lovely home of Mrs. Frank Baker with Mrs Guy Youngblood as co-hostess. The house was attractively arranged with beautiful flowers. The visitors and members were greeted by Miss Mary Frances Confer. Mrs. Deans Holcombe, club president, presided over the meeting. During the business session, the roll was called by the secretary, Mrs. Guy Youngblood. Members answered to the roll call with house hold hints; which were very interesting. A social was discussed to be planned real soon by the social committee. A card of thanks from Mrs. Louis Tillman was read to the club.

Congratulations to our Scoutmaster for the New Tenderfoot that arrived at his home May 10. The Tenderfoot name (Hoye Jr.) The weight 11 Pounds.

Columbiana Troop Notes

The Scouts meeting was held in the High School Auditorium, Friday, May 29th, 1936. The Scout Master and assistants discussed the important facts of the Scout Organization and the programs of the following meetings.

A number of new and more strict rules were adopted by the troop which will go into effect at the next meeting.

Ten were present and a very interesting and progressive meeting was held.

Jack Letson, Scribe.

Derris Controls Chewing Insects

Most garden insects, including bean and potato beetles, and cabbage worms can be controlled by using a mixture of one pound Derris and 7 pounds of sulphur.

This mixture can be used without injury to the plants and without danger of poisoning the persons eating the vegetables.

In addition to controlling the chew ing insects, the mixture also repels the sucking insects and cotrols the red spider.

Farmers Advised Not Mow Kudzu Too Soon

Kudzu should be well established before beginning to mow,

It should be allowed to grow at least two full seasons before mowing is started and if the soil is very poor, it may be necessary to wait three seasons before beginning mowing.

Experiments by the Alabama Experiment station indicate that it is best to cut kudzu only twice each year—probably in June and October.

Heart Drifts

THOUGHT AT TWILIGHT

One day my soul
Will aureole
A silver star;
Yet God's firm will
Shall fail to thrill
Me or my star.

For though I'll soar
Above the shore
Of pensive earth
My heart will be
Where you will be
Pensive on earth.

My soul will glean
What stars have seen
High in heaven;
And I shall scheme
That you may dream
With me in heaven!

—E. M. S.

AGONY

Speech is cruel,
Thrusting word on word
Till the heart runs crimson
Under the sword.

Eyes are cruel,
They lock and withhold,
Congealing the veins
With their bitter cold.

But hours are most cruel
Of all cruel things,
For no one can hurry
Their slow dark wings.

—Faith Vials.

A PRETTY WOMAN

You are a bugle blown for a weary bivouac;
You are the splendor on burnished blades;
You're the west wind over a waste of sedges;
You are a teakwood cabinet filled with jades.

You are a topaz burned alone in a casket;
You are a glass to be drained and flung to the floor;
You are a reed that one might fashion for music;
You are a woman and you are nothing more.

—Contributed.

BELATED

I am not much concerned with death while life
Still holds me. I grow weary pondering
A riddle all will solve. The hours are rife
With questions, and I am through with wondering
For me the light that lingers on far hills,
The whispered lure of beauty at my door,
The ardor of the glamorous climb yet stills
The thought of what comes after or before.

I will be glad and crowd the day with laughter
The night with love, with music and with song;
It works no woe to me what may come after,
So I may gather flowers all along.
When the dark stranger knocks upon my gate,
I will be ready. DEATH, WHY ARE YOU LATE?

—A. S. T.

COMPANIONSHIP

It isn't that we talk so much
Sometimes the evening through
You do not say a word to me,
I do not talk to you
I sit beside the reading lamp
You like your easy chair,
And it is joy enough for me
To know that you are there.

It isn't that we go so much.
Sometimes we llke to roam
To concert or to theatre,
But best of all is home.
I sew a bit or read aloud
A book we want to share,
And it is joy enough for me
To know that you are there.

It isn't that you tell to me
The thing I've come to know.
It goes too deep for words I think,
The fact you love me so.
You only have to touch my hand
To learn how much I care.
And it is joy enough for me
To know that you are there.

Farmers' Cash Income Highest In Six Years

Farmers' cash income to date this year is the largest since 1930 and further gains are in prospect, reports the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

Total sales of products plus government benefit payments was $2079 000,000 the first four months of this year compared with $1,970,000,000 in the corresponding period of 1935.

Farm income in the second half of 1936 will depend to some extent on the new crop yields, says the Bureau. But it is probable that if industrial activities are maintained at the level now in prospect income will continue to exceed that of a year ago.

Serious Labor Troubles in Many States—Moley Warns the Administration—Municipal Bankruptcy Act Is Held Invalid.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

FACTORIES and farms in 15 states, in all parts of the Union, were affected by labor troubles which intermediaries were trying in vain to settle. Leaders of organized labor claimed that from 30,000 to 45,000 strikers already were out, but employers challenged the union claims that the strikes were effective.

Workers in six plants of Remington Rand, Inc., were out on strike after union leaders ordered a walkout at Syracuse, N. Y. They said 6,000 workers in the company's New York, Ohio and Connecticut plants were involved. Company officials asserted there were 4,200 affected.

Six thousand barbers in lower Manhattan, New York, were ordered to join 3,000 others in a strike which had spread over a wide area of Manhattan, the Bronx and Brooklyn.

Striking seamen in New York were said to number 7,000 and there was a good deal of trouble over their efforts to picket the piers and the home of Mayor La Guardia.

Two hundred office workers and company police in Portsmouth, Ohio, were besieged in the strike-closed plant of the Wheeling Steel corporation; and in Akron, Ohio, employees of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber company were arrested for violating an anti-riot law.

In other states the union leaders thus estimated the number on strike:

Arkansas—Three thousand tenant farmers.

California—One thousand celery field workers.

Oregon and Washington—Seven thousand loggers.

Wisconsin — Twenty-five hundred workers in various industries.

Minnesota—About 500 millwrights, fur and cereal workers.

Indiana—About 175 in various industries.

Iowa—One hundred employees of the Burch Biscuit company in Des Moines.

South Dakota—Three hundred butchers at Morrell packing plant, Sioux Falls.

Nebraska—One hundred highway workers.

Texas—Sixty-two power plant workers at El Paso.

Vermont—Two hundred marble workers near Rutland.

RAYMOND MOLEY, who used to be considered the chief of the "brain trust," fears that his friend President Roosevelt may be destroyed politically by the radicals within the Democratic party who at the same time would "destroy moderation and destroy the very system which he attempted to improve."

Raymond Moley

In a speech before the National Economy league in New York, Doctor Moley said he saw confronting the Roosevelt administration these dangers:

1. That federal relief agencies will be turned into political machines to perpetuate the rule of state and local politicians.

2. The tendency, "all too prevalent in this congress, to engage in muckraking, marauding expeditions which destroy the liberty of all of the people while they seek to restrain the abuses of a few. These orgies of public castigation . . . may be means of furthering individual political ambitions, they may be build-ups for those with Presidential hankerings, but so far as the public interest is concerned they are simply sound and fury."

3. The tendency "of those in charge of the New Deal to over-emphasize adherence to the belief in the philosophy of the movement and to minimize the importance of competent technical administration."

Doctor Moley defended capitalism; declared that already there has been a wide distribution of wealth in this country, and warned the average man that he eventually must pay the mounting bills for relief—that he is the "missionary being fattened for a cannibalistic feast."

FIVE justices of the United States Supreme court held invalid the municipal bankruptcy act of 1934, declaring it to be an unwarranted invasion of state sovereignty. Four justices dissented, these being Chief Justice Hughes and Justices Stone, Brandeis and Cardozo. The majority opinion was written by Justice James C. McReynolds. The case was brought by bondholders of a water improvement district in Texas.

The municipal bankruptcy act was designed to permit cities and other political subdivisions which found themselves in financial straits to effect a composition, with the approval of two-thirds of the bondholders or other creditors, whereby the indebtedness could be readjusted, scaled down, or, as Mr. Justice McReynolds put it, "repudiated."

THE United States treasury will undertake the biggest peace time borrowing operation in the nation's history, Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau disclosed in an official announcement revealing that $2,050,754,416 of government securities will be offered the middle of June. This financing calls for an even billion dollars of new money, in addition to the $1,050,754,416 required to meet maturing obligations.

SENATOR ROBINSON'S resolution authorizing the continuance of the Florida ship canal and Passamaquoddy tide harnessing projects was favorably reported by the senate commerce committee after Mr. Robinson had told the members the administration wanted the schemes kept alive as work relief measures.

Senator Vandenberg of Michigan warned the majority leaders they had better not bring the resolution up in the senate if they really wanted adjournment by June 6, for he had 21 amendments to offer and each one would lead to prolonged debate.

Robinson's resolution authorizes the President to appoint two boards of three engineers each to examine and make reports upon surveys that have already been made of the two projects. They would have to report to the President by June 20 of this year.

"FRANK O. LOWDEN of Illinois will be the choice of the Republican convention for President if he will accept the nomination."

That was the confident prediction of a political observer who is usually well informed and close to sources of national party news. He declared there was a steadily growing demand from many parts of the Union for the nomination of the former governor of Illinois, who always has been popular with farmers and whose qualities of statesmanship are recognized generally throughout the country. Mr. Lowden is vigorous and hale, and he is always actively interested in the welfare of his state and nation, especially in the problems of the agriculturist.

Frank O. Lowden

CONGRESSMAN TINKHAM of Massachusetts is one of those Republicans who think the chances of their party for victory in November would be enhanced if a coalition with disaffected Democrats were formed and the ticket shared with them.

"The country is facing as great a crisis as it faced in the Civil war," he said. "This involves the very character of the government of the United States. The question is, 'Are the government and the institutions of the United States to remain American or become European or Asiatic?'

"This crisis is so great that it should eliminate all party lines, and the Republicans should nominate as Vice President a Democrat. I suggest that they nominate Alfred E. Smith."

FOR the third time Norman Thomas is the Presidential nominee of the Socialist party. He was selected at the national convention in Cleveland, Ohio, and George Nelson of Wisconsin was put in second place on the ticket. There was a great demonstration after the voice vote, but it was not joined in by the right wing leaders from several eastern states who were angered by the seating of a leftist delegation from New York. The disaffected ones threatened to form another party.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT starts on his trip to Arkansas, Texas and Indiana on June 8, and he told the correspondents it would not be a political tour. His speeches, he said, would be historical, dealing with early days in the three states. He has no slightest intention of stealing the show from the Republican national convention.

Mr. Roosevelt planned this trip some time ago so that he might take a cruise along the Maine coast line late in June with his sons.

ARABS of Palestine, rebelling against British protection of Jewish immigration, are causing Britain a lot of trouble. English soldiers fought real battles with the Arabs in several localities, and Jews throughout the Holy Land were arming themselves in self-defense. Casualties in the fighting were few, but the situation was so serious that Sir Arthur Wauchope, British high commissioner, asked the government for more troops.

EDWARD A. FILENE, Boston merchant, announced his withdrawal from the United States Chamber of Commerce, severely criticizing its failure "to study business in a business way" and to "substitute fact-finding research for opinion as a guide to decisions concerning the needs of business in general—even as opposed, possibly, to the ambitions of special interests."

Mr. Filene has been a consistent supporter of President Roosevelt's administration, and the Chamber of Commerce has been increasingly critical of the New Deal.

LEON BLUM, elderly and rather fragile leader of the French Socialists, will soon be premier of his country, and he is going to have a hard time living up to the expectations of all the leftists, who are making a national hero of him. The other day hundreds of thousands of French reds and pinks marched behind Blum or stood cheering on the sidelines, and pictures of the leader were carried in the ranks or sold by hawkers in the crowds. This was on the occasion of the traditional memorial ceremony in Pere Lachaise cemetery for the Marxist martyrs of the Paris Commune in 1871.

Leon Blum

M. Blum is said to be watching closely his publicity in the United States since his speech in which he intimated a desire to agree with Washington on the elimination of war debt discussions. He is hoping to be able to obtain loans from New York bankers. The Johnson law is naturally an insurmountable obstacle to France's obtaining any kind of credit in America, but as the Paris Midi pointed out Blum went out of his way to declare that France has not forgotten the war debt and fully expects to bring it up for discussion some time in the future.

ON JUNE 15 the bonus baby bonds will be mailed to 45,000 post offices from Washington and from the eleven federal reserve centers. Final plans for delivering the bonds to the veterans were announced by Postmaster General Farley, who predicted that payment on a great majority of them would be made within one week.

Mail carriers have been given instructions to "go out of their way wherever necessary with a view to effecting delivery," Farley said. The bond packets must be delivered to the veteran in person, and not to another person or firm at the veteran's address.

"If it is impossible to locate the veteran to whom the bonds are addressed," Farley continued, "they will be held for 30 days at the post office of destination before being returned to the respective federal reserve centers and thence to the Treasury department."

The bonds will be in $50 denominations with accompanying checks to cover the odd amounts. To collect cash, the veteran must have his bonds certified through his local post office.

Post offices in 241 cities have been designated as paying centers for their districts, and 59 large city offices have been empowered to pay on bonds issued outside their own districts.

ITALIANS celebrated the anniversary of their country's entrance into the World war with imposing ceremonies that included the promotion of more than half a million boys and girls in the organizations of young Fascists. Premier Mussolini presided over the "graduation," and after reviewing a great military parade, the Duce told the shouting crowds:

"The spectacle of the force of youth exhibited this morning on the anniversary of our intervention in the World war, the first phase of the Fascist revolution, has been magnificent and a warning at the same time. We are preparing the young armies of tomorrow for defense of the empire. Since they are animated by the Fascist spirit they will be invincible. This is the law of the revolution. This is the supreme will of the whole Italian people."

While his conqueror was thus engaged, Haile Selassie, deposed emperor of Ethiopia, was embarking at Haifa, Palestine, for England, on the British destroyer Capetown. Two sons and a daughter accompanied him, but former Empress Menen remained at Jerusalem. The exiled monarch, after a visit in England, intends to go to Paris, hoping to stiffen French resistance to Italy in the League of Nations. He may succeed in this, for the incoming Socialist regime in France will endeavor to restore the league's prestige.

THE office of transportation co-ordinator, held by Joseph B. Eastman, is due to expire on June 16, but Senator Wheeler of Montana had ready for introduction a resolution extending it for two years, and President Roosevelt was on record as approving some of its activities.

J. B. Eastman

It was reported in Washington that railway management and labor, both of which have opposed some of Eastman's doings in the past, might unite in an effort to block extension of the office, but Eastman said he had heard "nothing substantial" on that line.

Eastman announced last February he would exercise his powers to compel railroads in 11 cities to carry out terminal unifications as economy and efficiency moves. He withheld the orders at the suggestion of President Roosevelt, however, to permit rail management and labor to agree on some plan of protection for employees thrown out of work in such consolidations.

CONVERSATIONS between Great Britain and Russia now going on in London will have to do only with naval armaments in European waters, for the Soviet government has announced that it cannot consider limitation of its far eastern fleet while there is no similar agreement binding Japan.

Speaking for the government, Karl Radek said in the newspaper Izvestia that the Soviet union has been striving to conclude a separate agreement with Japan, but thus far the efforts have been fruitless.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

Washington.—Two groups of Republican leaders wish James A. Farley would keep right on hitting Gov. Alf M. Landon of Kansas. The harder the better. Especially in the period between now and the convening of the Republican convention at Cleveland.

One of these is the Old Guard die-hard contingent—the boys who want to stop Landon. They hope Farley, and for that matter the vitriol-penned Charles Michelson, will keep up a barrage against the Kansas Coolidge.

The other group is composed of men who believe Landon is going to be nominated, and who, while not particularly enthusiastic at the moment, intend to support him with all their strength. Their motive is to draw all the fire possible now, rather than have the Democratic smearing machine move into action only after the convention. In short, they would like to know now just what sort of ammunition the Democrats intend to use against Landon.

Moreover, they operate on a theory frequently stated in connection with the famous Alfred E. Smith speech before the Liberty league. Many Democrats as well as Republicans believe that had this speech been delivered next October, instead of last winter, it would have had a tremendous effect.

Thus they would like all the charges against Landon that can possibly be brought put before the public now, instead of later in the campaign.

The political sagacity of this hope is so generally recognized that most politicians and observers here were very much surprised that Farley should have referred, even so indirectly, to Landon. They are particularly surpised that Michelson, who writes all Farley's speeches, should have used the expression "governor of a typical prairie state."

Implied Sneer

This surprise is not because there is any logic in the theory that it might irritate citizens of other prairie states. There is not much logic in politics, anyhow. But there is an implied sneer in the words, which, coming from a New Yorker, might easily irritate two men in this precinct and three women in that all through the Middle West—might plant a seed now which would turn a few voters in close states against the New Deal, even though by election day these same voters might not have a conscious memory of what it was that started them turning against Roosevelt.

It was, naturally, unpremeditated. It is the sort of phrase that creeps into a well-rounded sentence where the writer or speaker is thinking of the main point, and does not realize that a subconscious thought on something entirely different has come to the surface.

But there it is, and how can it be retracted?

Meanwhile, most Democrats and Republicans alike in Washington agree that Farley is perfectly right in assuming that Landon is the man Franklin D. Roosevelt will face. One of the prime movers in the undercover Frank O. Lowden movement admitted with some disgust to the writer that he did not see how Landon could be stopped. He was particularly disgusted with the "covered wagon" picture publicity, but added, "Man alive, how the folks eat it up!"

In the senate cloakrooms the old-timers still think Landon will not be nominated. They think the Old Guard will stop him, and their best bet is Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg. But it would seem that they are overestimating the Old Guard strength!

Food and Drug Act

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt is generally regarded by friends and foes alike as a go-getter, but she has not been able, so far, to make much of a dent in the impasse which blocks passage of the food and drug act, in which both she and the President are very much interested personally, though the President does not regard it as a political "must" for this session.

It may be that somewhere in Washington can be found two people who know something about the pending food and drug legislation who agree as to the merits of its provisions, and on what is going to happen, but it is difficult to locate them. Most of those interested are willing to talk only in whispers when they speak at all on this delicate subject.

In the face of more spectacular things, most news writers have virtually ignored the subject. Yet here is a bill of enormous importance to every man, woman and child in America. This is not an attempt to say the measure should be passed. It is very difficult to determine that. For one thing, those who think it is going to pass have no idea in what form it will be when finally enacted.

Mrs. Roosevelt, for instance, is known to think that the bill is very weak, should be strengthened greatly and most of it revamped. But she thinks the present draft as it came from the senate, or the draft that seems more in favor in the house, would be better than the present law.

But another group of earnest advocates of reform along this line, who agree mostly with Mrs. Roosevelt's ideas, think it would be far better if the present attempt to get legislation should fail altogether. Their thought is that if no new law results from the efforts of the present congress, it will be much easier to get a real law, with sharp teeth, through the next session. Whereas, if a law should be put through at this session, in some weak form, it might be next to impossible to get through the kind of law they want at the next session.

Fight Complicated

Complicating the fight is a bitter difference between advocates of new legislation as to where the power of enforcement should be lodged. At present the law is enforced by the Department of Agriculture. Incidentally, officials there are not only anxious to retain their present power, but they think a new and stronger law a necessity.

But there is a very strong group who, while agreeing that a new law is a necessity, want its enforcement lodged with the federal trade commission. Both administrative outfits have been lobbying as hard as they could, the one to keep the power where it is at present, the other to transfer it to the federal trade commission.

The food processors and the drug and chemical trade are split wide open as to their desires in this direction, some of their representatives fighting on one side, and some on the other.

The nearest approach to an agreement as to prospects, which can be obtained by questioning everybody interested, is that if a food and drug bill passes at all, the final text will be so rewritten in conference that it is impossible for anyone to forecast even a general idea of the final form.

Slap for Morgan

Appointment of David E. Lilienthal to serve nine years as a member of the Tennessee valley authority was a square kick in the face to Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, head of TVA. Doctor Morgan's resignation has been lying on President Roosevelt's desk for weeks, and Doctor Morgan has made it very clear to the President that he could not work with Lilienthal.

But the President agreed with Lilienthal's ideas about TVA—not those of Doctor Morgan.

Briefly, the difference was over fundamental policy, complicated by mutual incompatibility. Neither of the men is famous for being able to get along with colleagues. Quite the contrary, in fact.

But it is the difference in policy, not the personal characteristics of the two men, that is really important.

Doctor Morgan regarded the whole TVA as the biggest demonstration of river control ever attempted in the world's history. If it could be demonstrated, he has held, that this important river can be controlled, particularly as to floods, the whole river, flood and drouth situation in the United States, and for that matter the world, could be worked out intelligently in the light of that experience.

Claimed by Lilienthal

It was Lilienthal who claimed in public statements that it was TVA which had compelled the Georgia power and electric companies to reduce their rates, whereupon officials of the company disclosed that their rate reductions had started before TVA came into existence, and made a rather convincing case to show that they had followed in natural sequence—entirely aside from the fact that there was no immediate threat that TVA current would invade their locality.

Doctor Morgan had several long conferences with the President in the few days preceding Lilienthal's nomination by the White House. It is generally believed by friends of the two men that the President has no thought of getting the two men to work together permanently. In fact, he knows they have not worked together at all, each working separately on his own ideas of the job.

In the near future, though this may wait for obvious political reasons until after election, Doctor Morgan will be given a post of much honor, which will seem to be a promotion, but which will actually be intended to give Lilienthal a free hand to use TVA for knocking private utility rates down. One of the suggestions is that Doctor Morgan may be put in charge of the Columbia river project.

There he will be forced to make the power development angle paramount.

Need Air Dictator

Conviction that the bureau of air commerce of the Department of Commerce needs a dictator is gradually seeping in on members of Chairman Mead's post office and post roads committee of the house of representatives.

In fact, some members of the committee agree that perhaps a dictator in this important job might have saved a good many lives lost in aviation accidents in the last few years. This does not mean criminal carelessness, or lack of ability or efficiency on the part of any individual in the bureau. It just means that the normal progress of political appointments has thrown together in authority there a group of men who cannot or will not pull together. This in turn has brought about a state of "office politics" which would make some of the old feuds in the Army and Navy departments look like petting parties.

In the army and navy they cause trouble enough, but the little matter of rank takes care of the situation. When an admiral gives an order, there is nothing for the captains and commanders and lieutenant commanders under him to do but obey.

In the bureau of air commerce, when the chief gives an order, some of the lieutenants rush up to their friends on Capitol Hill, or in the cabinet, and right away there is a little war, with not much of importance done until it is settled.

Say Boundary Dispute Caused Trojan War; Helen a Myth

Debunkers now tell us that the Trojan war was probably the result of a boundary dispute, and was not caused by the abduction of Helen, the beautiful wife of King Menelaus, by Paris, and that Helen was a myth.

Still, Helen's story must have happened somewhere; it's too good a story just to be made up, even by a war office propagandist.

"She was lying down on her bed when a gag was clapped over her mouth. Pharaoh, of course: but alone. She put up a fight, but he very soon had his way. He bound her wrists and ankles and took her master key. Then he carried her down her private staircase and into a secret room—the antechamber, in fact, to the cellar where lies the gold.

"I'm afraid there's no doubt that she suffered: but, except that Pharaoh put it across her, she simply leaves that bit out. But he must have been pretty ruthless, for in the end she opened the secret panel concealing the cellar steps.

"Well, Pharaoh and Dewdrop went down, to view the gold; but Rush and Bugle remained in the chamber on guard. I ought to have said that her hands and her feet had been freed. Still, she hadn't much chance, for they kept a torch on her face.

"I shall never understand why Pharaoh employed two such wash-outs as Bugle and Rush. The first thing those two bright lads did was, between them, to drop the torch. By the time they'd found it again their prisoner was gone. The door to the secret room is a secret door. It cannot be opened from within. It was, therefore, standing open. In a flash my lady was out and had shut the door.

"Well, though she was safe, she wasn't clear of the wood. She was locked in a staircase-turret, and Rush had her master key. She called from the embrasures, but, as the castle was empty, there weren't any ears to hear. Then, after a while she found Sabre standing beside her, licking her hand."

I felt that such a statement demanded some sort of expression of disbelief.

"But you said—"

"You shut your face," said Geoffrey. "Truth is stranger than fiction—every time. The door to the turret was open and so were the doors to her room. But her room had been used. The thieves had escaped by the chimney, entered her room by the fireplace, cleaned themselves up in her bathroom and disappeared."

"The obvious thing to do was to search the castle forthwith. I ought to have said that long before I got back. the switchboard had been repaired and the lights had come on, and while my lady was talking, the staff which had been scattered was trickling back. Florin and I induced some sort of order before beginning the search.

"We began with my lady's bedroom. One look at the hearth was enough. There was soot all over the place. But nothing and nobody else. We left the watchmen there and my lady and Florin and I went down to the secret room. It was empty now, we knew, for Pharaoh and company were gone: but the door to the cellar was open and my lady wanted it shut."

He took a deep breath.

"I'll tell you what we found. We found Pharaoh, Dewdrop and Rush—all three of them dead."

"Go on," said I, incredulously.

"Fact," said my cousin, shortly. "I'm glad you weren't there to see it. It was a dreadful sight. Bugle had done the three in and then cleared out. I fancy there'd been some scrap. Pharaoh's back was broken: he had no wound.

"And here's my interpretation of this astounding find.

"In Pharaoh's absence Bugle and Rush between them let Lady Helena go. Warrantably fearful of the consequences of what they had done, Rush and Bugle quarrelled, and Bugle killed Rush. Afraid to face Pharaoh—such a dereliction of duty meant almost certain death—Bugle decided to kill him and Dewdrop, too. And so he did. Then he escaped by the chimney, with Lady Helena's master key. This let him out of the castle by the way by which he came in. Why he waited to let her out, I cannot conceive. Possibly some twinge of conscience—you never know. That's one of the points which we shall never clear up."

"Then everything's over," said I. "The terror is laid."

"The terror is laid," said Geoffrey. "Bugle remains, of course. But I very much doubt if we shall see Bugle again."

Thoughtfully I regarded my napkin.

Was it five or six days before a corpse rose to the surface of the water in which it lay?

"Then everything's over," I repeated.

"Except the interment," said Geoffrey: "which is fixed for tomorrow evening, as soon as it's decently dark. As you seem to have had a night off, I think you might help with that."

* * * * * * *

Six days had gone by, and my precious secret was safe.

This was hardly surprising. Only two beings knew that I had approached the castle that terrible night: and of these the one was a dog and the other was dead. I had not used Barley's pistol: I had cleaned my cousin's knife: my filthy garments lay hid in the Plumage woods. Nobody knew that in my notecase was Helena's master key.

But another secret was safe.

On the Sunday night Pharaoh, Dewdrop and Rush had been laid in a common grave, not far from the mouth of the tunnel that ran from the moat.

Though nobody knew it but I, Bugle had yet to appear. For some unaccountable reason the moat still withheld its dead.

My cousin was painting Plumage. Twice a day he visited Yorick: but I was not invited and would not go up unasked. Neither would I go to Plumage—although I longed to see her—because I was sure that Helena sat with my cousin and watched him at work.

I had made up my mind to leave Annabel and to go and stay at Innsbruck which was a city I knew. My cousin was to follow with Barley in four days' time.

And so I was sitting at Annabel, cursing life and regarding my half-packed trunks with at listless stare, when the host of the inn came bustling with a note in his hand.

Dear John,

"Your cousin tells me that you are leaving tonight. Before you go, will you be so good as to show me where young Florin lies? I would not ask you this favour, but I was fond of young Florin, and you are the only being who knows the site of his grave. I cannot believe you will refuse me, and so, if it will suit you, I will call for you today at a quarter to three. Please will you tell the bearer 'yes' or 'no.'

HELENA.

I went down to the door of The Reaping Hook, to speak to the groom.

"Tell her ladyship 'yes,'" I said.

* * * * * * *

As the coupe stole into the forecourt, I descended the steps of the inn.

Helena smiled and nodded and I took off my hat.

"Will you drive, please?"

With a pounding heart, I took my seat by her side, perceived the glow of her presence, discovered her faint perfume. . . .

The spot to which we were going lay 12 miles off, and, after leaving the car, we must walk half a mile through the forest to come to the dell. Be sure,

A Gag Was Clapped Over Her Mouth.

I drove slowly enough. . . . But though half an hour went by before we left the coupe, in all that time we never exchanged one word.

Again and again I sought to make some remark, but I feared that my voice would tremble and so betray an emotion I did not wish her to see. To sit thus by her side, as I had sat so often, was stirring the depths of my being, as though with a sword. Though I kept my gaze fast on the road, with the tail of my eye I could see her peerless features and the gentle, steadfast look on her lovely face. She was neither grave nor smiling, but something betwixt the two: her air was the air of one whose day is over, who has of choice withdrawn from the lists of life and is now content to sit and watch the tourney in which she will ride no more. I had never seen her like this and at first I could not discover what it was that I found unfamiliar in the beauty I knew so well: and then I saw: the eagerness was out of her face.

When I brought the car to rest, Helena was out in the road before I could open the door. Then we entered the forest together, as we seemed to have done so often in other days.

In silence we came to the glade where Geoffrey had been painting when I first set eyes on the thieves, and in silence we passed to the coverts which might have been planted on purpose to keep the dell. And then at last we came out—not quite as I had intended, above the bluff, but lower down, between the bluff and the water, at the edge of a sloping lawn.

Helena caught her breath.

"Oh, John, how lovely," she said.

Though I knew the spot was handsome, when I had seen it before I had been too much distracted to consider the features that went to make it so rare.

"It's finer than I thought," I said quietly. "I never saw it from here."

For a moment we stood together, looking down on young Florin's grave.

"I must bring old Florin," said Helena. "I think it would help him a little."

Helena sat herself down with her back to the rippling brook.

"I'd like to stay friends," she said. "I know you're going away, and I think you're right. But I'd like to think that though our—our moments are over, we still were friends."

"If you please," said I, dully, and sat down a little apart. "I've so much to thank you for."

"I don't know that you have. But that's neither here nor there. We've peered at big things together—you and I. We've eaten of strange, sweet fruits—like two children, hand in hand. And now we're back where we were—where we were when you came to Plumage and I told you about the gold. We can go farther back: perhaps we have. But I'd like to stop there, if you can. I mean, one can always be friends."

"I can stop there," I said thickly.

"That's right," said Helena gently. "I thought you could."

For a moment she looked at the palms of her little hands, as though to consult those pretty pages before proceeding with a discourse that was making my heart feel cold.

Then—

"When I say friends, I mean it. I'll always have a feeling that I can depend upon you. I shan't attempt to, you know. But I shall be glad of the feeling. You know. When things go wrong, it makes a world of difference if you can say to yourself 'If So-and-so were here, they would understand.'"

"You can count on me," I said. "You let me come to know you as—as I'll never know anyone else."

"Will it help you, John?"

"I don't know. I'll write and tell you."

"That's right. And I'll always answer. You see, my dear, we must never meet again. We've looked at glory together—and turned away. It wasn't our fault, you know. We rather . . . rushed our fences. But down in that valley of shadow we gave each other judgment . . . and the judgments were good."

I could not speak. I sat as though turned to stone. My heart in my breast was ice. The blow which had fallen already, had fallen again. I had nothing to lose, and had lost it. "From him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

"I—I don't know that mine was," I said desperately.

"I'm afraid it was," said Helena. "I put my love above honor—and you mustn't do that. And in any event mine was. You took my love and you put it back in its place. I don't say you weren't right to do it, because you were. But there are some flowers, my dear, that you can't transplant. I mean—if you move them, they die."

Blow upon blow. Couldn't she see that the thing she was striking was dead? Everything and everyone was dead. Young Florin and Pharaoh and Dewdrop and Bugle and Rush, and now her love. And I had killed them—not Bugle, of course, nor young Florin. But everything else.

"That's all right," I heard myself saying. "I'm glad . . . it's dead."

There was a long, long silence. By the time it was over I had myself in hand.

At length—

"Poor Bugle," said Helena slowly. "He did me a very good turn."

"By dropping the torch?" said I

"I suppose he dropped it," she said. "But Rush was bullying me, and sometimes I think that Bugle was going to stop him. I don't know, of course. When it fell, I just flew for the door. And in any event he waited to set me free."

"A twinge of conscience," said I.

Helena shrugged her shoulders.

"He needn't have done it," she said. And then again. "Poor Bugle. I'll always remember him kindly. I think he was the best of the lot."

"I think you're right," said I. "I had a weakness for Bugle, to tell you the truth. Of course Rush showed him off."

"I know, I know. But he had a spark of feeling. More than a spark, I think. Very few men, placed as he was, would have troubled to let me out."

"What will you do," I said, "about the loss of your master key?"

"Change the locks, I suppose. It's a hideous waste of money: but if Bugle's tempted, you know, there are plenty of crooks who'd pay a long price for that key."

I dared not pursue the matter: to do so would be to sail too close to the wind. I decided that Bugle must show another spark of feeling by returning her master key. I would post it to her.

There was another silence.

With her eyes on young Florin's grave, Helena spoke again.

"That wasn't the only reason why I wanted to see you before you went. I want your help in a matter. . . .

"Your cousin is painting my picture—he's nearly done. It is the most lovely portrait. . . . And as he won't hear of a fee, I want to make him a present.

"Well, I've got a cup at Yorick, an old, gold cup, with a curious history. Years ago, in the sixteenth century, the Yorick of that day was painted. A young painter came from Vienna, a man called Latz. Had he lived, he would have been famous, for the picture is terribly good. Your cousin picked it out in an instant as being the best of the lot. Well, when the painter had finished, the count was so pleased with his work that he called for wine and drank the young man's health, and when he had drained the cup he called for gold. I suppose his treasurer brought it. Then he filled the cup with gold pieces and gave the painter the lot. I hope it was adequate payment. In those days it probably was. The next morning the painter left Yorick to make his way home. On his lonely ride to Salzburg the poor man was robbed and murdered—his body was found by the road. Now the thieves didn't break up the cup, but six months later they tried to sell it at Innsbruck where Yorick then had a hotel. But, as it happened, they took it to the very goldsmith that Yorick himself employed. The moment he saw the arms, he knew that the cup had been stolen, and, to cut a long story short, the thieves were taken and hanged and the cup came back to the castle because the poor painter was dead.

BRISBANE THIS WEEK

The Big "Black Legion"
More and Better Babies
A Worried Empire
U. S. Dollars Emigrate

The "ritual" of the murderous secret society called the "Black Legion" contains some old "Know - Nothing" features. The candidate for admission must be "willing to commit murder, to proceed against Catholics, Jews and Negroes"; he must be "native born, Protestant, white and gentile."

Arthur Brisbane

The "Black Legion," which probably will not last long, had ambitious plans. Among other things it proposed to overthrow the federal government, which is not an original idea. It was also going to set up a dictatorship, with night-riding regiments to enforce discipline. Dictatorship is not a new idea, either.

Strange things are done or planned in the name of "liberty" now, as they were when Madam Roland mounted the guillotine platform.

Russia wants bigger families, like Mussolini and others with "plans." Stalin wants plenty of new little citizens.

A thousand million rubles will be set aside by Moscow to "subsidize large families and aid mothers." Birth control ladies and gentlemen will hear, surprised, that aid to large families will begin after the seventh child. Seven are taken as a matter of course; that is just the beginning of a Russian family.

Chancellor Hitler of Germany joins in the "more and better babies" cry.

The German ideal is no longer the beautiful golden-haired Margaret, spinning her wheel and saying "No." The Nazis demand women who, "above everything else, can become the mothers of several children," and are willing to do so, according to a representative of Chancellor Hitler.

William Philip Simms, English, is afraid the British empire may not survive, on account of "air fleet peril."

Britain is disturbed by the thought that her whole imperial line of communication, stretching 4,000 miles from the Straits of Gibraltar to the Gulf of Aden, is under Mussolini's bombing planes. Except that her empire is the biggest, England should not worry more than other countries. With surface ships losing all importance, except in the opinions of some Americans, anybody's bombers can break up any line of communications temporarily.

"Americans investing huge sums in the Bahamas, to escape income tax," says the New York Times, big type, front page.

Americans have been "investing huge sums" elsewhere, outside of the United States. Billions of American money have gone to Canada, England and other "foreign parts." More will go.

In all the Bahamas, 4,403 square miles of beautiful territory, there is no income tax. Think of that for a happy country.

Needless to say, if enough American money pours in to make it worth while the intelligent British will find a way to tax it.

Germany has proved the "48-hours-from-Europe-to-America" possibility, with America looking on.

Now England is rushing preparations for a line of heavier-than-air planes to fly between England and America, starting in a few months, and the French, preparing a similar line, are negotiating for a half-way harbor at the Azores. The southern route was said to be the wisest by Lindbergh, shortly after his great flight.

Many Frenchmen are disturbed and puzzled by the situation in Europe, and General Mordacq, close associate of Clemenceau in the war, discusses the question, "What would Clemenceau do if he could come back?"

France feels the need of "a man with a fist," un homme a poigne, and Clemenceau was that kind.

Concerning that fine old fighter from the Vendee, it is safe to say that if he came back he would hasten preparations for another war. But he would not have waited until now.

Marshal Badoglio, who cleaned up Ethiopia so swiftly, has been called to Rome, perhaps as part of a wise plan not to let anybody grow too big, like the tree Igdrasil, supposed to have its roots in hell, its topmost branches in heaven.

A new comet now approaching us, discovered by and named for L. C. Peltier, amateur astronomer, who works in a garage, will be the first comet visible to the naked eye since 1927.

Germany cut off the head of a sixty-five-year-old man convicted of killing 12 boys. Before death, "examined" by Nazi officials who thought he might be a Communist, he admitted many other murders. He used a secret poison that doctors could not detect.

Human nature is naturally lazy. We do everything from motive, and the strength of the motive measures the result of the effort.

Black-Draught Good Laxative

Black-Draught has been kept on hand for all the family in the home of Mr. W. A. Lemons, of Independence, Va., since twenty years ago. Mr. Lemons writes that he takes it as a laxative in cases of "headache, dull, tired feeling, biliousness."

"And I take it if I feel uncomfortable after a heavy meal," he adds. "I especially use it for sick headache. It certainly is good."

When a man says "Black-Draught is good," it is probably because he remembers the prompt, refreshing relief it brought in constipation troubles. It is a simple, herb laxative; natural in composition and action.

Be Sure They Properly Cleanse the Blood

YOUR kidneys are constantly filtering waste matter from the blood stream. But kidneys sometimes lag in their work—do not act as nature intended—fail to remove impurities that poison the system when retained.

Then you may suffer nagging backache, dizziness, scanty or too frequent urination, getting up at night, puffiness under the eyes, feel nervous, miserable—all upset.

Don't delay? Use Doan's Pills. Doan's are especially for poorly functioning kidneys. They are recommended by grateful users the country over. Get them from any druggist.

You Must Sign For Your Bonds Yourself, And Be Identified By Two Witnesses

Veterans, there is a three-sided problem in identification before you get your bonus bonds and convert them into the currency of the republic. While it may look like government red-tape gone wild, it has been devised to keep others than yourself from getting your money.

First, there is the problem of getting the bonds in your possession when the postman brings them around on the night of June 15 or 16.

The letter carrier must be satisfied beyond all doubt that you are the man (or woman) for whom they are intended. He will require you to sign your name twice, once on the little yellow registry receipt slip and then again on the salmon-colored postcard that goes back to the Veterans' Administration.

Now just what the postman will require in the matter of identification is difficult to say. Under the plan Postmaster Livingston has adopted, the chances are that the letter carrier will know you. He knows most of the people on his route.

If some person signs for your bonds besides yourself, retribution will come swiftly and will wind up in a federal prison. The signature on the salmon-colored receipt card will be compared with your signature on your bonus application, and if they are not the same, the matter will be turned over to the Post Office inspectors and much woe will result.

Second, is the matter of identifying yourself to the postmaster so he will accept the bonds and in exchange therefor give you a Treasury check. There are several steps to be taken before this is done. They are (trace these steps with the aid of text on back of bond):

1. The veteran must sign on the back of the bond the application for payment, and give his address. The address must be that on the face of the bond and the signature must conform to the name on the bond. That is, if said John B. Doe, don't sign J. B. Doe. Sign John B. Doe..

2. The veteran must produce two witnesses who know him and who are known to the postmaster's representative, who must also sign on the back of the bond, giving their addresses in the space allotted for that purpose. In this matter the letter carrier on the route where the veteran lives will be on duty to identify him if he can. Representatives of veteran's organizations also will be present to help in identification.

3. The postmaster's representative, upon acceptance of the veteran's identification by the two witnesses will certify just below that the veteran has been properly identified.

4. After identity has been properly made and certified, the postmaster, if still in doubt, may demand the veteran place his fingerprints on the bottom of the back of the bond. This will not be required generally, but at the discretion of the postmaster, or his authorized representative, and is not to be protested if demanded.

These things must be done with every bond received. Should a veteran have ten bonds ($500 worth), all the foregoing must be done ten times. The average veteran will receive 11 bonds ($550 worth).

These details accomplished, yet another gauntlet of identification must be run before the check received for the bonds can be cashed.

The government requires positive identification of the person cashing a Treasury check. Banks have had a great deal of trouble in the last few years from improper persons presenting checks for payments and then having the rightful owner come along and prove a forgery. In such cases the bank is the loser.

There is no set routine through which the veteran must go to establish his identity. There are no fingerprints, but the bank must be satisfied, and the bank is the sole judge of its own satisfaction.

In this connection, it is pointed out that most of the heads of the veterans' organizations are well known to the bank officials, and cultivation of their acquaintance between now and the time the checks are to be cashed would tend to make such identification easier.

OUR REPUTATION ABROAD

Out of New York, news wires recently carried this brief:

"A group of European tourists, arriving today on the liner Girolstein, refused to land until Custom Officer Arthur Webb assured them they would not be shot immediately by gangsters.

Trivial and abused on the face of it, of course. It makes little difference what a handful of European tourists thinks of us over here. But the significance of this affair lies in the reason back of this odd European conception of America and Americans.

We have tolerated the criminals and condoned the corruption of public office for so long that it is difficult now to stand out before the world as a nation of essentially honest people. Our crass indifference in lawlessness not only injured our national character, but it smeared our reputation at the same time.

POEM FOR BRIDES

June roses. Aisle of candle light,
The parson's voice, a ring, a kiss,
A mist of tulle enshrouds you....
Ah, you've plotted....waited....dreamed of this!
And now, as sure as Fate edures,
Pin stripes....gardenia....he is yours!

You've dreamed of every day to come,
Of all the little tender thrills,
Of writing "Mrs." on the checks
That pay the precious monthly bills.
(Now try and make the checks hold out!

That's what yo unext will dream about!)

You've dreamed of sunny breakfasts .....you
In ruffled aprons, omelets high.....
For dinner, English mutton chops
Blueberry muffins, apple pie!
(You've yet to learn.....ironic joke....
The dinner dreams that end in smoke

With blistered, weary little hands
You'll have those "home to Mother" blues,

You'll sit before the evening fire,
Your Robert lost behind the news....
This traded for the fancy hours
Of dates and dances....phones and flowers....

But never mind.....it's Heaven you've found.....
A Heaven that's safe and warm and sweet.....

So prune your dreams and preen your love.....
You've golden slippers on your feet....
And you shall walk the starlit skies..
And of new dreams.....weave lullabies.....

JUNE TIME! Moonlight and roses! Bride time! Rose time Cupid working over time, and wedding bells chiming their happy melodes uniting hearts "until-death-do-us-part"—and what a glorious, radiantly happy month! We cordially welcome JUNE!

There are so many lovely diversions scheduled for this most popular month on the calendar, we wish we could be in a half a dozen places at the same time. First, the members of the Press Association can be found cruising around Cuba after June 14th—when they, with their friends in other lines of endeavor other than the pen point industry, will be visiting that enchanting tropical city known as Havana. On June 16th, the Alabama Writers will be joined by artists from all over the South n their regular annual session in Alabama College. We have just received a call this morning from the Conclave's most popular President, Dr. George Lang of the Univer sity of Alabama, summoning us in no uncertain tone—leaving us not a loop hole thru which to jump—to appear on the very first day in Montevallo. We are wondering what the reaction will be on our charitable artistic freinds when we take a leap from this sea of printer's ink and attempt to land back into a somewhat battered musical "Dream Boat"—we once made, and sailed on the sea of Melody! On the prow of this mythical Dream Ship was painted in colors we thought would never fade —HOPE! Now, after several years vacation from this DREAM CRUISE we have substituted the word HOPE, for WISDOM, which now adorns her prow! A sadder but a wiser little bird is plying the oars—but the DREAM which inspired the architectural structure referred to—remains! The BOAT?—It is floundering around in some unknown and unchartered sea—but the voyage while it lasted was worth while. and the little Ship O' Dreams is still sailing right on into the Port of Dreams Come True. The GOAL?—Well, who knows?. We only realize more each day how much we value the friendship of our comrades in the idealistic world. We have found in their charitable reception of a few little "heart songs"—we have offered on various occasions, an inspiration—whose brilliance the gloom of the darkest day we have known, has failed to obscure. We shall happily journey over Montevallo way to rejoin these friends of ours who have long since scaled Mount Parnassus —but whose topmost pinnacle reached has not been high enough to bring forgetfulness of those less fortunate in achievement—but who often stoop to lend a helping hand to those of us who continue to derive a keen sense of joy in the mere creation of an idea! JUNE will bring many moments of happiness to those who will attend these instructive and entertaining programs which have been arranged for your pleasure at the conclave. Dr. Lang extends a cordial invitation to all who are interested in writing, art, music, drama, poetry, etc., to attend these meetings.

Eleanor Ann Walton, talented entertainer from Birmingham, is the guest of her Uncle, T. R. Walton in Columbana. Little Miss Walton is a favorite radio and stage favorite in the Magic City, and should she choose a professional career, she will likely be TOPS. We have not had the pleasure of greeting the little lady but we hope to meet her before she returns home.

Dan Harper attractive son of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Harper of Birmingham came into the offce Tuesday and after asking us a newspaper riddle, decided he would like to take a trip over the shop and see how the DEMOCRAT looked before it was made ready for mailing. He is a typical red headed all American boy whom we enjoyed talking with—and who knows—he may some day decide to EDIT a weekly. He stated frankly he thought the whole "works" great.

Charles Augustus Groubie made his formal bow on Main Street one day last week, and we had the pleasure of greeting this handsome young manikin of 2 months. He is as powerful as his name indicates, and as jolly and friendly as St. Nick. He gave us a cordial smile of welcome while he lay contentedly cradled in his Grandmother Groubie's arms. You might as well begin watching these young Americanos—they are Columbiana's future citizens of whom we are already predicting a brilliant future.

We are delighted to acknowledge receipt of a letter enclosing another year's subscription to the Democrat from our good friend, Sam Lit of Maylene, Alabama. Mr. Lit is one of Shelby County's most prosperous merchants and we happily reserve his chair in the ever widening circle of weekly readers for 1936!

THE PESSIMIST

Nothing to do but work,
Nothing to eat but food.
Nothing to wear but clothes
To keep one from going nude.

Nothing to breathe but air
Quick as a flash 'tis gone;
Nowhere to fall but off,
Nowhere to stand but on.

Nothing to comb but hair,
Nowhere to sleep but in bed,
Nothing to weep but tears,
Nothing to bury but dead.

Nothing to sing but songs,
Ah, well, alas, alack!
Nowhere to go but out,
Nowhere to come but back!

Nothing to see but sights,
Nothing to quench but thirst,
Nothing to have but what we've got
Thus thro' life we are cursed.

Nothing t ostrike but a gait;
Everything moves that goes
Nothing at all but common sense
Can ever withstand these woes.

Claude Matthews, former athletic director of Shelby County High School, now teaching in Scotsboro, was a guest of friends in Columbiana this week

Attention: Donald Lathem

In closing this page we pass on just one of many incidences which make the newspaper industry an interesting avocation. Some weeks ago, Donald Lathem of Siluria (the young nephew of Judge L. C. Walker) asked is ROOSEVELT was getting the DEMOCRAT, stating in his boyish enthusiasm that he SHOULD be receiving it-so Mr. Nolen thought well enough of the idea to send a one dollar bill in and asked that the PRESIDENT be included in the num ber of readers for this particular periodical—so— immediately we got busy and presto—there was the President's name plus the paper's journey to the Nation's capitol. Clippings were inclosed in an envelope with never a thought they would receive attention in this busy mart of political activities—but—just to show you what kind of a PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT is, we reprint a letter just received:

"The White House,
May 28, 1936

Dear Miss Wallace:

The President has received your paper and has asked me to thank you for your thoughtfulness in sending the clippings to him.

He deeply appreciates the friendly interest evidenced in having your newspaper sent to him.

Very sincerey yours,
M. A. Le Hand,
Private Secretary."

Now isn't that a happy note on which to close? Again a little child got 'em told and in a big ay got results!

Bills may come, and bills may go, but some go on forever.

It's strange how one hay fever victim can recognize another.

Fishing may be all right but right now we'd welcome an opportunity to just plain loaf.

A LETTER FROM
Thomas Minor
To The Voters Of The First District
—:o:—

I note that last week's issues of the Democrat and the Reporter carried a signed article from my opponent C. R. Tinney, stating that the total indebtedness of District No. 1 amounted to $11,468.69.

I find from a personal investigation of the records that $55,231.94 of the County's money has been expended by Mr. Tinney during his tenure of office (3 years and 5 months) in addition to the enormous amount of Federal Relief money which was expended on these roads.

In going over the District and travelling the roads in the County, the question arises—HAS THIS SUM OF MONEY, $55,231.94, BEEN SPENT WISELY?....I respectfully request that you write your answer on June 9th when you will cast your vote for the man to fill this responsible position.

I have deeply appreciated your consideration of my candidacy, and pledge to you, if I receive the nomination as Representative from District Number One on the Board of Revenue, that I shall favor no particular section, but I shall endeavor to distribute the funds allotted me equally over the entire District and require full value for each dollar of your money expended.

Thanking you again for your support, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,
THOMAS MINOR

Mine Roof Cave-Ins May Be Predicted by New Instrument

May Mean Prevention of Future Catastrophes

STATE COLLEGE, PA.—A new device to detect mine roof cave-ins and the type of disaster which occurred recently at Moose River, N. S., has been developed at the Pennsylvania State college here.

The frantic and spectacular rescue efforts which saved the lives of the two men at Moose River emphasize anew the hazard which roof collapse brings to mining operations and recalls the fact that 50 per cent of all deaths in well-kept commercial coal mines occur from this source.

Dr. H. Landsberg of the School of Mineral Industries has found that in all roof cave-ins so far studied a definite break occurs in the overhead rock strata several hours before the final cave-in takes place. The shale and dirt, he found, support the roof for some time after the supporting rock has gone beyond its breaking point.

Detects Initial Break.

Secret of success of Doctor Landsberg's device is to detect the initial break, in time to warn the working miners. His instrument is called a convergence recorder. From its use can be made predictions much like those a weather man may make after reading the barometer.

The apparatus consists of two steel tubes which slide inside one another like the tubes on a trombone. The sliding tubes are kept apart by a spring and are placed in the mine so that one tube touches the roof and the other the floor of the shaft. A movement as small as 1/100 of an inch between roof and ceiling can be detected.

Predicts Time of Crash.

Following the initial break, Doctor Landsberg points out, the rates of convergence of the roof and floor increase rapidly until the entire mine roof collapses. By studying the rates of convergence, the exact time at which the internal rock structure was broken can be detected and the final cave-in predicted.

Further work is being done along this line by both Doctor Landsberg and the United States bureau of mines in an effort to establish a more definite relationship between the rates of convergence of the roof and floor of a mine, and the collapse of the roof structure.

Wives Talk Silently in Caucasus Village

TIFLIS, U. S. S. R.—An old-fashioned sign language, in which married women talk silently to their husbands, has been studied by Soviet scientists. It is an old Caucasian custom.

An expedition of the Tiflis Institute of Caucasian Studies found the gesture language surviving in isolated villages of Armenia, Georgia, and other sections, and has published a scientific account.

In this quick and silent language, a woman can represent a word or often a whole phrase by a single gesture. Married women use the system not only with their husbands, but in speaking with relatives and elderly male strangers.

Candidates Get Name From Old Roman Custom

AUSTIN, TEXAS.—Modern politicians inherit the name candidate from the old Romans. But most office seekers never heard of the costume that fits the title.

Office seekers were called candidati, meaning men in white, by the ancient Romans, says Dr. H. J. Leon of the University of Texas Department of Classical Languages. The nickname fitted in those days, because office seekers advertised themselves, wherever they went, by wearing wool togas made super-white by rubbing in fuller's chalk.

"This was undoubtedly a convenient and happy practice," comments Doctor Leon, "but there is no evidence that it did away with baby kissing."

Indians Have Spinach That Has No Sand!

WASHINGTON.—It turns out now that Indians in Arizona eat an Indian sort of spinach. They have been eating it for years, and liking it.

The plant grows plentiful around Wupatki National Monument in the Hopi Indian country. Hopis prepare and eat it, just like white man's spinach.

Animal Dictators Bully Associates Same as Humans Do

Study of Monkeys Shows How Leaders Dominate

IN A laboratory cage, two monkeys quarrel. One of them assumes command. That animal is boss. The other must dance to the tune he calls.

Why does the one become tyrant and the other slave? This is a problem that a psychologist has set out to solve. It is one having many implications for man in a world of dictators, political bosses, office tyrants and the myriad petty and glorified rulers of other men's lives.

Why is it that a man may be subdued and helpless in his home, but become a tyrannical slave-driver when he reaches his office desk? This is one of the universal human problems on which light is thrown by the study of monkeys now being conducted at Teachers' college, Columbia university, by Dr. A. H. Maslow.

Numbers Are Important.

The size of the group is very important in bringing out bullying behavior, Doctor Maslow has found. When three individuals are placed together, the situation is entirely different from what it is where there are but two or where there are four.

When Doctor Maslow's animals were paired, two by two, it soon became evident which were the most dominant monkeys in each conceivable combination of two. Then he introduced the third animal and the picture changed. Perhaps the newcomer was more dominant than either of the pair already in the cage and became over-lord. But would the other two be leagued against their common foe? No, indeed.

Strong Oppress Weak.

Always, among the rhesus monkeys, the strong are joined together against the weak, Doctor Maslow found. Here is a morsel of fact for the study of those interested in human conflicts. Kathryn, a playful, active monkey who apparently had within her the stuff that rulers are made of, but who, because of her small size, was always oppressed by any other single animal with whom she might be placed, turned this bit of monkey psychology to good account.

In the larger group, she who had always had to take all the abuse, suddenly turned on Whitey with extreme viciousness. The others joined her in the fight, and poor Whitey was bitten, beaten, and generally abused until he had to be removed from the cage to save his very life.

Meek Turn Dominant.

Thus Kathryn, the most meek of the whole colony of monkeys, when pairs were considered, became the most vicious animal ever observed when an alliance made it possible. It seemed as if all her dammed-up resentment were coming out all at once when the social situation made it possible.

Termites Now Known in Every State in Union

CHICAGO.—Termites, whose timber-ruining activities have caused a great deal of alarm in American cities, are now known to exist in every state in the Union, Prof. Alfred E. Emerson of the University of Chicago reports, in the current issue of Science. Vermont, Michigan, North Dakota, Wyoming and Montana are among northern states recently added to the termite list.

However, Professor Emerson adds—and emphasizes—this need not be cause for added alarm, or even for surprise. The winter-defying genus of termites are not invaders from the tropics, as has frequently been asserted. They are native to the temperate zone, and cannot even live in the tropics. Fossil evidence strongly indicates that this particular group of termites has lived in much the same kind of climate for many millions of years.

Cases of accidental introduction of foreign termite species into houses and other man-made environments are on record, Professor Emerson states.

Level of Sea Sank Half Mile During the Ice Age

WASHINGTON.—Once early in the great Ice age, about a million years ago, the level of the sea was 3,000 feet lower than it is now and the missing water was piled high upon the continents as ice of great glaciers.

This picture was presented to the National Academy of Sciences recently by Prof. Francis P. Shepard, University of Illinois geologist, as a result of his investigations of great river-cut canyons of the sea floor, some of them 10,000 feet below the ocean's surface or about twice the depth of famous Grand canyon in Arizona.

One explanation of how they were formed is that the coasts of the world were raised up above their present position during the glacial period. Professor Shepard considers such a gigantic movement in relatively recent times as "scarcely creditable."

Instead he told the academicians that it is much more reasonable that the sea level changed due to the withdrawal of water from the oceans to form the great sheets of ice that covered the land and that rivers cut the underwater canyons now being discovered.

Pleat, Tailor and Tuck Smart Silks

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

EVERY day in every way women who recognize the importance of selecting materials for the fashioning of their costumes that can be "put to the test and not found wanting," are turning to handsome dependable silks that are really and truly pure silk for the solution of their fabric problems.

The fact that a lavish amount of pleating, tucking, shirring and meticulous tailoring is involved in the styling of this season's smartest apparel is proving an added incentive to insist on silk of the better sort that may be relied upon to yield successfully to these varied and sometimes intricate manipulations.

Three outstandingly important fashion trends are presented in the illustration, each of which demonstrates the chic and charm of silk weaves in the current mode. For the perfectly stunning jacket suit the designer handles black and white printed silk crepe as tailor-perfect as if it were wool. The braid-bound edges of the jacket interpret a highly significant styling detail. As to the white organdy frill, it is a "last word" in accessory chic. Watch for these frilly-frilly effects; they are coming along at a fast and furious pace.

The other standing figure reveals Miss 1936 wearing a navy blue silk sheer with a pleated tunic, for you must know that the pleated tunic is a top-notch fashion for spring and summer. Men's wear buttons go marching down the front of the tunic pictured. Short puffed sleeves follow the latest dictate of the mode. Note that these are designed to give shoulder emphasis as all the newest fashions would have it. A tiny boutonniere and a yellow chamois belt stress the new vogue.

As to this matter of tunics, from all indications they are about to stampede the fashion picture. If in doubt, choose a tunic frock is timely advice, for it is to be tunics by day and tunics by night according to reports from style centers. Some tunics are straight and narrow while other tunics flare about the knees like a bell or a lampshade. Many evening frocks adopt pleated skirts with tunic tops.

Another big fashion feature is the blouse that is all-over pleated like the one shown in the picture. This blouse is of bright green pleated silk chiffon. It is worn with a black silk taffeta suit. Note the pleated frill about the throat. This is a favorite new neckline silhouette. And again please to observe that the sleeves are short and puffed in latest manner. The smartest flower turbans are topheavy in front. The one topping milady's prettily coiffed head is made of purple silk violets. Purple, green and black is the color scheme of this costume which goes to show how striking the new color alliances are this season.

The new and fashionable bolero costumes bring blouses into the very foreground of the fashion scene. With black bolero two-piece dresses or suits the outstanding color idea is to wear as bright a blouse as the new silk prints can afford or if not a print then let your blouse be of a high-color pleated silk sheer. Anyway, go the limit in matter of daring color for your blouse.

NEW COTTON LOOKS LIKE SILK OR WOOL

Cotton that looks like silk, cotton that looks like wool, cotton as sheer as the gauziest chiffons, coton velvets, cotton tweeds and cotton laces —all these will march in the fabric parade.

Cord laces will be the tops in spring and summer swank, shown in tailored sports clothes for resort wear now and all-round use later.

Peasant weaves also are slated for high success in natural neutral tones, both in cotton and linen, with bright accessories.

Embroidery, which has been creeping back into the style picture, achieves rampant recognition in the new cotton fabrics. Embroidered surfaces are all over the place, both in soft, homespun type of cotton fabrics for sports wear, and in the organdies and mousselines for evening.

Dark Blue Is Gaining in Popularity for Summer

The increasing popularity of very dark blue (called midnight blue by certain houses and raven blue by others) is hailed with enthusiasm by those who find black too somber. Another characteristic is the growing influence of purplish tones which are affecting the new reds and the new blues, although not yet prevalent in decided purple or violene.

Gray, while not prominent as a plain color, has a strong influence over blues, giving them a slate-blue shade. This influence is seen also in greens, which have the appearance of reseda green and verdigris. A new shade which is strongly sponsored for summer is burnt straw or toast.

Make Gloves and Shoes Match, Is Paris Decree

Gloves and shoes are supposed to match one another these days. One Paris bootmaker shows pumps which are cut completely in half, one side being of suede and the other of kidskin. These shoes can be obtained in almost any shade and are matched by gloves which are fashioned with backs of suede and palms of kidskin.

PRINT COATS

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

A plain coat topping a print frock is not news but a print coat topping a plain frock is latest news from fashion town. The model pictured typifies the new mode. In this instance the redingote is of black and white print linen over a black linen dress. The short sleeves proclaim a popular vogue for the summer. Bright silk print coats with monotone silk dresses, also jackets of gay floral silks that contrast plain skirts will be made a big feature during the coming months.

Book Buttons

Book buttons lend a "highbrow" air to several new mid-season frocks. They are tiny, closed volumes of black enamel whose leaves are edged with gold.

Lesson for June 7

JESUS IN GETHSEMANE

LESSON TEXT—Luke 22:39-53.

GOLDEN TEXT—Not my will, but thine, be done.—Luke 22:42.

PRIMARY TOPIC — When Jesus Prayed in the Garden.

JUNIOR TOPIC — Jesus in Gethsemane.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Loyal Christ.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Doing the Father's Will.

Jesus went from the upper room, where the last supper was eaten, to the Garden of Gethsemane. Night had now fallen.

I. Jesus at the Mount of Olives (v. 39).

The garden was a favorite resort of Jesus and his disciples on the slope of the Mount of Olives, a short distance east of Jerusalem (Matt. 26: 30). Gethsemane means "oil press," and the garden was a place where the oil was crushed out of olives. There is a striking significance in Jesus' coming to this place. Olive oil was precious, being used both for food and lighting. The bruising and crushing of Christ in this garden has yielded the largest blessings to the world—food for the souls of men, and light for their lives.

II. His Companions (vv. 39, 40).

Peter, James, and John, who had been with him on the Mount of Transfiguration, were permitted to go with him into the deep shadows of the garden (Matt. 26:37). He took those who were best able to apprehend the meaning of the tragic hour, and, too, as a human being he craved sympathy. Knowing the peculiar trial that would be theirs when the Shepherd should be smitten, his purpose was to prepare them for it. It was well that they taste the bitter cup of which he drank, and of which they, too, would later drink.

III. Jesus in Prayer (vv. 41-44).

1. Withdrawal from the disciples (v. 41). Even the members of the inner circle could not go with him through this hour. He went apart from them, for he must be alone with his Father in this darkest hour. Thus alone he kneeled and prayed.

2. What he said (v. 42). "If thou be willing, remove this cup from me." The cup did not primarily mean the physical sufferings of the cross, though they were exceeding great. He did not now desire to escape from the cross and thus to stop short of his redemptive work, for this was the supreme purpose of his coming into the world (Heb. 2:14). Rather it was the revulsion of his holy nature from the burden of sin which he was representatively to bear when the cross was placed upon him. He, indeed, was to be made sin for us who knew no sin (II Cor. 5:21). He was so completely identified with a sinning race that the judgment of a holy God which rightfully would have fallen upon it, was about to strike him.

The cup, therefore, meant his death as the bearer of sin. He came to Gethsemane with a full knowledge of what it meant, and here he bowed in submission to the Father's will. The agony of this hour drew from his brow as it were great drops of blood, but an angel came and strengthened him, and from that place of victory he went with unfaltering steps to the cross.

IV. The Sleeping Disciples (vv. 45, 46).

Though they had boasted of their fidelity (Matt. 26:35), they could not watch with him one hour. They were so benumbed by perplexities and sorrow that they slept, and could not watch with Jesus one little hour.

V. Jesus Betrayed (vv. 47, 48).

1. The betrayer (v. 47) was Judas, who had been at the last supper with Jesus; who had journyed up and down the land with the Lord and his disciples. The fact that he had listened to Jesus' teachings, had witnessed his miracles, had been with him in seasons of prayer (John 18:2), intensified the horror of his deed.

2. The sign of betrayal (v. 47) was a kiss, the age-long token of most tender affection and friendship. The betrayer now degraded that symbol of love by making it the instrument of disloyalty and treason.

3. The words that Jesus spoke (v. 48) to the infamous disciple reveal the infinite tenderness of his heart. But so hardened was the heart of the betrayer that he carried through his brutal contract to deliver the Redeemer of men for thirty pieces of silver. The money was in his purse; he must not weaken. The deed was done.

Shall not those who study this lesson inquire with deep earnestness if anything in their lives may be serving as a practical betrayal of Christ?

Good Deeds

"For every good deed of ours, the world will be better always. And perhaps no day does a man walk down a street cheerfully, and like a child of God, without some passengers being brightened by his face, and, unknowingly to himself, catching from its look a something of religion."

A Man's Acts

Man should be ever better than he seem; and shape his acts, and discipline his mind, to walk adorning earth, with hope in heaven.—Aubrey de Vere.

Wall Hanging of Colorful Peacocks That You Will Be Proud to Have Embroidered

How rarely one sees a peacock with all his lovely plumage displayed! This proud pair of colorful birds will hold this unique pose as long as your wall panel lasts. You'll want it done in a short time, of course, and it will be, for the actual embroidery goes very quickly, using only single, running and outline stitches. You may use either silk, wool or cotton floss, but remember—the more colorful it is, the prettier!

Pattern 1014 comes to you with a transfer pattern of a picture 15 by 20 inches; a color chart and key; material requirements; illustrations of all stitches needed. Send 15 cents in coins or stamps (coins preferred) to The Sewing Circle, Needlecraft Dept., 82 Eighth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Value of Virtues

THE virtues all lock into each other. They cannot stand alone. Like the stones of an arch, no one of them can be wanting without making all the rest insecure. That character alone is trustworthy in which each virtue takes its relative position, and all are held in place and confirmed by the keystone of a living faith in the great central fact, that there is a God of infinite goodness and truth, whose commandments are the laws of life in this world and in the world to come.—M. C. Ware.

Whooping Cough Is Killing Off Cannibals in South Seas

Cannibals still flourish in the South seas, according to T. H. Harrisson, who has just returned to England after nine months in Malekula, the second largest island in the New Hebrides group. During Mr. Harrison's visit, seven men were eaten, out of 30 killed in battles among the Big Nambas, as the natives of Malekula are called. Trifles seemed to cause these tribal wars: one began when a visitor from another village accidentally stepped on a chief's dog. But actually old and bitter feuds were at the root of nearly all these outbreaks.

But whooping-cough is killing off Big Nambas far more quickly than their habit of cooking one another for dinner. Six hundred out of 10,000 of the native population of Malekula and its small adjacent islands were wiped out by the disease of whooping-cough in one year alone.—Pearson's Weekly.

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

For at least two months, I have been intending to say something about the naming of Patrols. Somehow, every time I sit down to the old typewriter I just seem to forget all about it. But this time I am going to be sure of myself and tell you what I have to say of "Partols and their Names."

Any number of times you hear Patrol names that are very common and have no meaning whatsoever. Pick up any list of Patrol Names from various sections of the country and you will find the majority of them are the same. Such as Flaming Arrow, Blazing Arrow, Flying Arrow and any number of the different kinds of arrows are of the most common.

The boys themselves couldn't tell you why, other than the fact that they just liked the name.

When Patrol Names have a definite meaning the Patrol becomes an interesting one. Be as careful about what you name your Patrol as you would be about naming a child.

To give you an idea of how to name your Patrol, I am passing to you this letter, from the Dinosaur Patrol of Troop 24, Cleveland Heights, Ohio, which was written to Green Bar Bill.

"We chose our name because the Dinosaurs were the monarchs of the forest and that's what our Patrol is aiming to become, too. Our whole Patrol has taken an active interest in those prehistoric monsters, each boy specializes in a certain type of dinosaur. Every fellow has his own medallion in the Patrol color but with the design of his particular pet.

These range from the Patrol Leaders, which is the most ferocious, down to the meekest of the new Scout. As our members advance in Scouting, they advance in our ranks. And there is the incentive to get up among the most important members of the "Dinosaur Tribe."

If you do not have some difinite meaning for your Patrol then I would suggest that you change it. You might make a secret Patrol of it and only the members of the Patrol will know the name.

It would be rather difficult for any one to guess the real meaning of S. T. I. "Stick To It" and D. B. O. "Dan Beards Own." The other fellows would hardly attempt to penetrate such letters to expose the real name of your Patrol.

Try this if your Patrol does not have a real meaning, and you will be surprised what your Patrol will mean to you.

Wilton Troop Notes

Robert Adams, a Wilton Scout, who has been ill in a St. Louis hospital, is at home again. Good to have you with us again Robert.

The Troop combined its "Eats Night" and "Outdoor Night" on last Friday. This, with the combination of a beautiful moon made things very complete.

The troop met Thursday night and rehearsed a investiture ceremony for a Tenderfoot to come in soon.

Winston Hogan, Scribe.

Farmers Urged Plant Sorghum - Cowpeas

AUBURN—Planted on good land a combination of 25 pounds, or more of sorghum and 60 to 90 pounds of cowpeas per acre will still give excellent yields of hay, advises J. C. Lowery, extension agronomist.

Though difficult to handle, some good low land, which is not too wet will produce a supply of hay when planted to this mixture," he says. Since seed of the well-know combination can usually be purchased from one's neighbors, it is very practical for those who cannot obtain soybean seed.

CUBAN PRESIDENT TO RECEIVE PARTY

President Miguel Mariano Gomez of Cuba, has invited the editors of Alabama and all those who accompany them to a reception at the Presidential Palace. Mayor Mendieta of Havana will be host to the party at a reception, the Bacardi Company is planning a lavish entertainment, probably at the famous Yacht Club. Other interesting yet extremely pleasant things are being planned for the party which will spend the week of June 14th to 20th in a trip to Cuba, leaving Montgomery on the morning of June 14th aboard a special, air-conditioned train for Tampa, where they will board the steamer, "Cuba," bound for Havana.

Reservations for the trip are already close to two hundred, and all who desire to go are urged to make their reservations with the editor of this paper or with Convention Secretary E. C. Hall, Alexander City, Ala. as early as possible.

The public has been invited to accompany the editors, and many are taking advantage of the wonderful opportunities the trip offers. Especially attractive is the price of $73.70, which includes all meals, hotel, all transportation, and two sightsee trips ,as well as the courtesies to be extended the party in Havana.

LEADERSHIP SCHOOL

On Wednesday, June 17th, the third Leadership School for Home Demonstration Clubs will be held. The demonstration will be on food preservation.

The meeting will be held at Columbiana and all leaders and the Presidents of the Home Demonstration Clubs are invited.

'MUSIC GOES ROUND' MONDAY AT ROXY

Sparkling comedy, captivating singing, inspiring dancing, fine acting, lovely songs—put them all together and add a corking story that is as fresh as tomorrow's news, and you have, according to advance reports, Columbia's new musical film, "The Music Goes 'Round," which opens on Monday at the Roxy Theatre with Harry Richman, Rochelle Hudson, Michael Bartlett, Walter Connolly and Edward Farley and Michael Riley—and their 'round and 'round music—prominently featured.

It sounds like a large order, but when you consider all the very special ingredients that went into the making of "The Music Goes 'Round" it is easy to believe that it is one of the season's outstanding musical extravaganza.

Farmers Told How To Control Cattle Flies

AUBURN—Now is the time to declare war on flies, says W. H. Eaton of the dairy department of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, in advising that "barn lots, stables, box stalls, and premises in general should be kept clean in order to eliminate all possible fly breeding places."

The Alabama State Board of Health suggests the following fly poison: 1-2 pound sodium arsenate, 2 pounds brown sugar ,1 pint of viregar, and 1 pint of molasses with enough water to bring the volume up to 5 gallons. Shallow pans of this poison should be placed high enough to be out of reach of children, small animals and poultry.

The dairy department at Auburn suggests the following remedy for protecting cattle from flies:

On pound laundry soap dissolved in 3 gallons of hot water, mixed with 1 pound powdered moth balls which have been previously dissolved in 1 gallon of water, and finally adding one gallon of crude oil. This is not a fly killer but an excellent repellant. The mixture should be shaken before use and should be slightly applied with a brush.

One thing for the census, it permits commercial associations to lie nine years without apprehension.

Psychologists advise girls to show the best side of their dispositions. They might as well—they show everything else.

Works Progress Administration

MONTGOMERY—The choice of work program labor to lay the first stretch of cotton binder for paving in Alabama as a part of the "three-way" program is a source of gratification to the Works Progress Administration and a tribute to the demonstrated efficiency of the work program labor, Ray Crow, state WPA administrator said here today.

The paving will be laid under the joint supervision of the State Highway Department and the United States Bureau of Public Roads, the Bureau of Public Roads having allocated $3,000,000 dollars to test the use of cotton in paving material.

The "three-way" project chosen for the test is a 12 mile stretch between the Tuscaloosa county line and Reform, a heavily traveled road and considered typical in soil texture of most Alabama roads.

Nearly all of the labor employed on road paving projects, both on the "three-way" and the Federal aid routes was drawn from the work program reservoir. The "three-way" projects are financed by the State, counties and Works Progress Administration, each paying one third of the cost.

Approximately 450 miles of three way paving is being laid in the State Administrator Crow said.

"The Works Progress Administration" he said, "is delighted to have a part in this forward looking experiment, which, if it proves successful, may mean so much to the farmers and the cotton industry in the South."

"The Light of Youth" usually shines brightest late night.

Boys And Girls Raise $7,366 For Crippled

AUBURN—FFA and FHA chapters have raised a total of $7366.41 to help equip convalescent homes for crippled children in Alabama. A check for this amount has been turned over to Dr. J. A. Keller, state superintendent of education, by A. C. Allen, Jr., Holtville, state FFA president, and Miss Annie Moon, Ashland state FHA president.

The money raised must be spent to buy equipment from a list provided by surgeons at the three orthopedic centers in the State. The sum of $1,000 is to be spent in convalescent wards in Selma, there being no plan for a convalescent home there. The remaining $6,366.41 is to be divided equally between convalescent homes in Birmingham and Mobile.

That Zioncheck boy should be sent to the wood shed.

A Hollywood director returned frok a trip to New York says "there are no pretty women in New York." he das likely reporting to his wife.

If you failed to do your best at your task you have no right to offer an excuse. Remember that, young fellow.

A few weeks ago the Legislature was advised that if relief funds were not forthcoming at once, thousands of people in the Birmingham district would starve to death. No funds were raised and no one reported starving, but a strike in the coal mines is on and several killed and wounded and over 2,000 out of work. Hunger and distress must not have been as band as painted.

J. A. GRIFFIN SR. DIES IN MAYLENE

J. A. Griffin Sr., passed away at his home in Maylene, Thursday, the 4th day of June at the age of 76.

Mr. Griffin has lived in this community all of his life. He was liked by all who knew him. If he had an enemy any where it was unknown. He was a hard worker and a wonderful provider. May God's richest blessings be with the bereaved family.

It seems hard to give up our loved ones, but God giveth and God taketh, so as the years roll by, may we so live that we might meet those who have gone before.

Funeral services were held at the home Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock.

He was laid to rest at Cedar Grove Cemetery. Rogan in charge.

Alabama Farmers Apply For Payments

AUBURN—The State Soil Conservation Committee has received over 135,000 applications for cotton price adjustment payments, reports Walter L. Randolph, administrative officer in charge of the State Soil Conservation program.

Checks are being issued on these applications as rapidly as possible and mailed to county agents for distribution to farmers. The county agents are notifying the farmers as soon as the checks arrive in the county offices.

Farmers can still make application for the cotton price adjustment payments but there may be a considerable delay in checks being issud unless the applications are filed immediately with county agents. The delay on late applications will be due to state and county forces being busy on the new $470,000,000 soil conservation program.

NEW HOSPITAL FOR ALABAMA OKEHED

WASHINGTON—The veterans administration announced today President Roosevelt had authorized construction of a 250-bed veteran's hospital in Alabama.

A resolution adopted by the board of hospitalization recommended the new structure, and also suggested that the existing facility at Tuscaloosa be converted into a neuropsychiatric hospital to accomodate 350 patients.

The site for the new hospital has not been selected.

Senator Black, of Alabama, protested when the board decided some time ago to build a new hospital in Tennessee, abandoning the Alabama plan. After another hearing, the board recommended the Alabama hospital in addition to the one in Tennessee, which was to have cared for Alabama patients.

The total cost of the Alabama plan was limited to $1,100,000.

Sudden Death of Speaker Byrns—Rome Hails Badoglio While London Cheers Haile Selassie—Kural Housewives of World Convene.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

DEATH, sudden and unexpected, came to Joseph Wellington Byrns, speaker of the house of representatives, and put an end to a notable career. The veteran Tennessee congressman suffered a heart attack, followed by a cerebral hemorrhage, and passed away within a few hours in his apartment in the Mayflower hotel, Washington. For 27 years Mr. Byrns had represented the "Hermitage district" of Tennessee in the house, and he was elected speaker when the Seventy-fourth congress convened in January, 1935. He was a master of parliamentary strategy and so fair-minded a presiding officer that all, even his political opponents, praised and admired him. Before becoming speaker he served long years on the appropriations committee, as member and chairman, and he also was leader of the Democratic majority and chairman of the Democratic congressional campaign committee.

J. W. Byrns

Grief for Mr. Byrns' death was general and sincere in Washington officialdom. "I am shocked beyond all imagination," said Representative Bertrand H. Snell of New York, the minority leader. "It is a terrible thing. It is an almost irreparable loss."

Senator Joseph T. Robinson of Arkansas, the majority leader, after expressing his own sense of loss, added: "His work during the session has been very difficult and trying. He was a great speaker."

President Roosevelt in a statement from the White House expressed well the high esteem in which Mr. Byrns was held. Said he:

"Fearless, incorruptible, unselfish with a high sense of justice, wise in counsel, broad of vision, calm in adversity, and modest in victory, he served his state and the nation with fidelity, honor, and great usefulness. I personally mourn the passing of a steadfast friend of many years."

Impressive funeral services were held in the chamber of the house, the President, members of the cabinet and numerous diplomats being present in addition to all members of congress. The body was then taken to Nashville, Tenn., for burial, and Mr. Roosevelt accompanied the special congressional committee there.

The house elected William B. Bankhead of Alabama speaker for the remainder of the session.

The death of Speaker Byrns followed closely that of another well-known congressman, A. Piatt Andrew of Massachusetts, a Republican. He died of influenza at his home in Gloucester at the age of sixty-three. Mr. Andrew, who taught economics at Harvard more than thirty years ago, was director of the mint for a few months under President Taft and then was assistant secretary of the treasury. He was elected to congress in 1921, and supported much of President Roosevelt's early legislation.

MISS CLARA DUTTON NOYES, sixty-six, director of the American Red Cross nursing service, died in Washington a few minutes after she was stricken while driving to work in her car. Miss Noyes was assistant director of the American Red Cross nursing service during the World war. She also had been superintendent of nurses at the Bellevue and allied hospitals in New York.

Cyrus Hall McCormick, whose father developed the farm reaper and who himself helped organize the International Harvester company and was its president for 33 years, died at his home in Lake Forest, Ill., at the age of seventy-seven years. He was noted as a progressive business man, liberal with his employees and always interested actively in public welfare movements. He was rated as one of the wealthiest men in America and gave millions of dollars to educational and charitable organizations.

MARSHAL PIETRO BADOGLIO, conqueror of Ethiopia and now viceroy of that part of the reconstituted "Roman empire," returned to the Eternal City in triumph and was vociferously welcomed as a hero. Sixty thousand Romans welcomed him as he stepped from his train, and Premier Mussolini modestly waited in the background until they had shouted their greetings to the veteran warrior. Then Il Duce came forward and kissed the viceroy on both cheeks, and the high ranking Fascist military leaders paid homage. With the premier and the picked troops forming the escort of honor were the entire cabinet. Several days later a great military review was held.

Viceroy Badoglio

The other side of the picture was seen in London, where Haile Selassie, the deposed emperor of Ethiopia, arrived in tears and sadness, though he was given an ovation by the cheering thousands that had seldom been accorded to visitors to England. Many of the Londoners carried Ethiopian flags or scarlet banners reading "Welcome to the Emperor." With the white sympathizers were many African chiefs in native robes, Somalis, negroes, Hindus, Chinese, and colored people from all parts of the world.

There was an outburst of wild cheering when Selassie, bareheaded and wearing a long black cape, stepped from his private sleeping car and was greeted by many notables, including O. C. Harvey, private secretary of Anthony Eden, British foreign secretary. Harvey was the lone representative of the British government.

JUST as the "popular front" in France was taking over the government the country was distracted by strikes that spread rapidly to almost all industrial centers and involved all manner of trades. The workers demanded higher wages, a 40-hour week and a closed shop, and they went out by the hundred thousand though they knew they were causing great embarrassment to their own leaders. In many cases the strikers took possession of the closed plants.

In Spain the syndicalists tied up various industries by strikes that involved about 250,000 workers and that were marked by several murders and other outrages. Augusto Barcia, minister of state, said the government planned to outlaw the syndicalists if they persisted in disobeying orders from the ministries of labor and the interior.

J. H. THOMAS, until recently British colonial secretary, was found responsible by a special government tribunal for the leak in budget secrets which enabled some of his friends to profit largely through insurance against tax raises. Final disposition of the case was left to the house of commons. Thomas, once an engine wiper and later a powerful figure in organized labor and politics, termed the tribune's verdict "cruel." He said: "My own conscience is clear. I repeat what I previously stated upon oath: that I made no disclosures of budget secrets to anybody."

RURAL housewives from many countries began their third triennial conference in Washington with Mrs. Alfred Watt of Canada presiding. Their first meeting was held in 1930 in Vienna, and the second in Stockholm three years later. Secretaries Hull and Wallace and Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, wife of the President, extended greetings to the visitors, but beyond that there were no set speeches and little formality. Instead, the farm wives held "exchange of experience" sessions, viewed elaborate exhibits of rural needlework and crafts of organized countrywomen of the participating nations, and attended "open houses" held by all branches of the federal government in which countrywomen are particularly interested.

Mrs. Alfred Watt

In exchanging experiences the women learned, among other things, that:

English groups have stimulated a remunerative revival of quilting to supplement the family income.

Australian countrywomen maintain seaside homes for convalescents. Canada's Federated Women's institute promotes clubs for rural youth and combats maternal and infant mortality.

By conducting evening classes for young girls Danish countrywomen have helped to check their migration to town to seek factory work.

IN A report just made public the business advisory council proposes a simplified basis for industrial self-regulation through the medium of voluntary joint agreements on unfair trade practices enforceable by the federal trade commission. The report was prepared by the council's committee on unfair trade practices of which Lincoln Filene of Boston is chairman.

Outstanding among the committee's proposals were suggestions that each branch of an industry, such as wholesale, retail, and manufacturing, police the activities of each other through confidential reports to the federal trade commission and that no attempt be made to include trade practice and labor provisions in the same agreements.

THE so-called industrial mobilization plan of the War department, providing for a military dictatorship over labor, capital and industry, as well as censorship of the press in war time, was severely condemned in a report to the senate by the munitions committee.

THE senate by a vote of 62 to 14 passed the deficiency bill carrying $2,375,000,000, of which sum $1,425,000,000 is handed to the President to spend as he pleases for "relief and work relief." As passed by the house, the measure turned the entire amount of relief money over to WPA Administrator Harry Hopkins.

Three Democratic senators voted against the bill—Tydings of Maryland, Bulkley of Ohio and Byrd of Virginia.

By a senate amendment, the bill authorizes the President to order a restudy of reports on the $200,000,000 Florida ship canal and allocate another $10,000,000 to carry on work upon it during the coming fiscal year.

Efforts to do anything for the Passamaquoddy tidal project in Maine had proved unavailing.

NEW YORK state's law providing minimum wages for women and minors was declared unconstitutional by the United States Supreme court on the ground that it conflicts with the fourteenth amendment by violating freedom of contract. The decision, written by Justice Butler, was concurred in by Justices Van Devanter, McReynolds, Sutherland and Roberts. Chief Justice Hughes and Justices Stone, Brandeis and Cardozo dissented. A number of other states have statutes similar to the one thus held invalid.

CATHOLICS the world over celebrated the seventy-ninth birthday of Pope Pius XI, and the pontiff himself marked the day by attending a solemn mass in St. Peter's in the presence of 40,000 pilgrims who went to Rome especially for the occasion. These were mainly members of the Catholic Action organization which Pius XI founded, and to them he spoke for nearly an hour. He denounced communism, as he has done on other occasions, and declared the Catholic press was one of the best forces in combating the communists.

Pope Pius XI

It was evident to all observers the pope's age is beginning to tell on him and that he found the long ceremony very much of a strain.

NINE of the richest unions in the American Federation of Labor, having more than a million members, probably will be suspended soon by the federation's executive council, and at the next convention they will be expelled if the council can command the necessary two-thirds majority. Thus will come to a crisis the internecine contest between the craft unionists led by President William Green and the industrial unionists who follow John L. Lewis, head of the United Mine Workers.

Green wants to continue to organize industry by skilled groups while Lewis would seek to unite all workers, skilled and unskilled, by industries into one big union.

The craft unionists, it was learned, intend to suspend the charters of the nine industrial unions at the July executive council session, a power granted the council under the A. F. of L. constitution.

Lewis' group of unions includes 400,000 miners, Sidney Hillman's Amalgamated Clothing Workers, David Dubinsky's International Ladies' Garment union, the oil workers, typographers, flat glass workers, hat, cap, and millinery workers, mine, mill, and smelter workers, and textile workers.

THERE was every reason to believe that Japan had found, or manufactured, excuses for further encroachments in northern China, and that serious conflict between the two nations would ensue unless China were submissive. The Japanese alleged that a bridge on the railway line between Tangku and Tientsin was destroyed and that there was an attempt to wreck a troop train. The highest Japanese officers in North China were summoned to a conference in Tientsin.

Yakichiro Suma, Japanese consul general in Nanking, declared publicly that China must choose either "mutual interdependence with Japan or war with Japan," and he said he had informed Generalissimo Kai-shek, Chinese dictator, of this viewpoint. "Japan has gone too far to retreat now and must advance straight ahead with immutable convictions," Suma said.

The Japanese military command, meanwhile, disclosed frankly some of their demands upon China. These included:

1. Privilege of building railroads, military and civilian air bases and army barracks.
2. Establishment of regular air service between China and Japan.
3. An economic, political and military position for Japan in China.

STEWART McDONALD, federal housing administrator, outlined to newspaper men a new program which provides for the construction of "garden homes" outside of large cities that will aid in the gradual movement of industrial workers from urban and suburban areas to small plots several miles out in the country. He said President Roosevelt was enthusiastic over the plan.

Emphasizing that "this is not anything in the way of a benevolent proposition" and that no grants of federal funds were involved, Mr. McDonald said it would be accomplished through a broadening of FHA regulations to permit government insurance of mortgages on such property. This will enable bankers and other leaders to advance funds for the development of these "in between" areas for residential purposes.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

FAMOUS WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington.—In the prize ring and in war, experts agree that it is a splendid quality not to know when you are licked. Because there is always the possibility that something may happen to reverse the apparent.

So perhaps a good deal of credit should be given the administration leaders on Capitol Hill for the earnestness with which they push on to new legislative achievements, regardless of the clearly printed road signs saying the road is closed ahead on account of the constitutional bridge being washed out.

Consider the sugar bill, for example. Administration leaders declared they would push through the bill continuing quotas for domestic production. They admit that there may be some little doubt as to the power of the federal government to do this, especially in view of the AAA decision, not to mention the Guffey decision.

It's a little bit humorous, however, when one considers what is happening out in the country. For instance, the big cane sugar producing state, Louisiana, is assigned a quota under the system that the legislators are about to continue, without the Supreme court's blessing, of 260,000 tons.

Present estimates of the Louisiana cane sugar crop, with due allowances for weather and other possibilities, run around 500,000 tons.

So the question arises, how will the government induce the cane planters of the Creole state to plow under nearly one-half of their acreage, and not take the matter to court? For it is admitted that any court would grant an immediate injunction restraining the Department of Agriculture from using any element of force. And it is equally clear that anyone interested could bring a suit to prevent payments under the old benefit check system.

Soil Erosion

There remains soil erosion, of course, but everyone admits that the administration would not be willing to risk the constitutionality of its concededly ticklish soil erosion program in such a case. To accomplish anything like the reduction necessary to get Louisiana down to her quota would require such drastic handling that no serious contention that soil erosion was the main objective could possibly hold.

It's just one of those curious things, on all fours with the enactment of the Guffey coal law in the first place, when everybody and his brother knew it would be thrown out the window by the high court. And on all fours with the present desire of Senator Joseph F. Guffey and others to enact a substitute for the Guffey law.

They persist in this despite the carefully considered opinions of such politically astute gentlemen as Senator J. Hamilton Lewis that there is neither the opening nor the time for such a measure before adjournment. And in the face of a view from a very different wing of the party—its most radical wing—of Senator Burton K. Wheeler that it should not be attempted at this session.

Meanwhile the United Mine Workers are not half so unhappy as they make out. They see the prospect of making a few fights in the very territory where they are weakest.

And Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins expresses a pious hope for new labor provisions in the revised Guffey bill to come!

Silver Buying Policy

Despite the clamor of unofficial "Brain Trusters," economists, etc., about the absurdity of the present silver buying policy, nothing is going to be done about it. The present silver buying policy will be continued, even the paying of a bonus of something in excess of 30 cents an ounce for all newly mined silver in the United States.

No one really thinks the subsidy to mine owners producing silver is really either very beneficial or very harmful. The point is that there are almost no mines in the United States that produce just silver only. In virtually every instance silver is a by-product and a comparatively small by-product. Normally the main products of such mines are lead, zinc and copper. It so happens that ever since the depression began there has been an overproduction of all three of these metals. Hence it is believed by mining experts that the bonus paid on newly mined silver has not done any harm or any good in stimulating silver production in the United States. Nor is it contended that there has been much cheating. The government has been extremely rigorous in its inspections, and officials do not believe that much foreign produced silver has been sneaked under the wire to take advantage of the high American price.

One criticism of this bonus on newly mined silver is that it is a waste of money. In the face of terrific federal expenditures in almost every conceivable direction, the cost to the federal treasury of this particular policy sinks into insignificance.

In the early days of the silver buying program United States treasury buying had a very unsettling effect on conditions all over the world. The world price was boosted about 40 cents an ounce. It was practically doubled. Another very heavy loss was taken by the treasury here because the average price paid was considerably above 50 cents an ounce—the price at which all domestic silver, already mined, was commandeered. Whereas the present world price of silver is around 46 to 47 cents, with every prospect that it will not rise materially above that.

China Protests

There were other repercussions. China protested bitterly against the unsettling physical scheme and the disorganization of her international trade resulting from it. Eventually she was driven off the silver standard by it. The recent agreement on the part of the United States to buy large amounts of Chinese silver is one of the after effects. Incidentally the treasury is as secretive about the amounts of Chinese silver that it intends to purchase under this agreement as it has been about the use of the two-billion-dollar stabilization fund.

The reason there is not going to be any change in the silver policy—certainly until after election—is that two small minority groups in this country are enormously in favor of it. One of these is the silver mining group which now benefits from the subsidy. The mine owners of course divide this bonus among themselves. The mine workers think that it helps to keep them employed. The other group is for the silver policy because it believes in inflation. Failing to get printing-press money through the Frazier-Lemke bill or any other device, those holding this view like the silver policy on the theory that half a loaf is better than no bread.

These two groups feel so violently on this issue that a change on this one thing would probably make them vote against Roosevelt. The majority, who think the policy crazy, will vote for or against Roosevelt for other reasons.

Resettlement Costs

Full information on how much it costs Dr. Rexford Tugwell's Resettlement administration to do its resettling became available for the first time recently, imbedded in the hearings of the senate appropriations committee on the deficiency bill.

Resettlement's top is $20,250 a family, reached in a prairie paradise for 13 families at Sioux Falls, S. D. The final bill was $276,000.

This project was described by Doctor Tugwell as financially "unsuccessful."

The outside per family cost for a successful project appears to be $11,940, since that much is to be allowed in a project which the Tugwell organization is contemplating at Osage Farms, Mo.

Among the other projects being "planned, just being started, or under construction," there were listed three more whose per family cost was above $10,000, and five for which the treasury will pay out anywhere from $7,270 a family to $9,500. Tugwell said the average cost per family was only $5,000.

Civil Service for Bureaus

The civil service commission and Senator George W. Norris, Republican, of Nebraska, recently urged the President to bring the emergency bureaus under civil service regulations. Norris even warned the President that his failure to halt the spoils system would cost him a million votes.

At the same time, a last minute drive is under way to secure enactment by congress of the bill placing first, second and third class postmasters under civil service.

More than 50,000 positions may be affected by executive orders affecting jobs created during the emergency period.

Since some of these new government activities have come to be regarded as permanent adjuncts of the federal machinery, advocates of civil service reform have redoubled their demands that the jobs be filled on the merit system.

While the majority of present occupants of the jobs automatically will be retained under the new regulations, future vacancies will be filled only on the basis of competitive examinations.

Besides fitting into his announced views on the subject of public employment, the shifting of the new bureaus to civil service is counted on by the administration to offset criticism on that score.

Republican critics, on the other hand, do see a campaign issue in it. They are charging that the proposed blanketing of present emergency employees into the civil service by executive order just a few months before the election is a political move to keep Roosevelt administration partisans in their present jobs and continue them on the payroll in the next administration should Roosevelt be defeated in November.

Origin of Jig Saw in Doubt

The origin of the jig saw is shrouded in mystery. But it is thought to be very ancient. Roman emperors and nobles are said to have whiled away their leisure hours by fitting pieces of colored marble together, which formed a mosaic picture. Perhaps this was the birth of the jig saw.

Introduced Archery

A writer in the New York Times says that archery as a hobby was introduced in this country by Maurice Thompson in 1879. Thompson was born in Franklin county, Indiana, September 9, 1844, and died in 1901.

"So you see that cup will make a most appropriate gift. But I'm so afraid that your cousin may refuse to accept it that, before I ask him to do so, I want to have it engraved with his crest. And that's where you can help me. I must have something of his that bears his crest, to give to the engraver to copy. A cigarette-case or a flask. Perhaps it's on the backs of his brushes. . . . You see, without that I'm stuck. At the present moment I don't even know what his crest is."

I wrinkled my brow.

"Strangely enough," said I, "it's the same as your own—a leopard. But that doesn't mean—"

"What?"

The word flamed.

As the saying goes, I almost leapt out of my skin: and turned to find her staring—tense, wide-eyed and staring, white to the lips.

And then I knew I was lost. I had learned her crest from Pharaoh, and Pharaoh was wrong; and I had repeated the error which Pharaoh had made.

"I—I thought," I stammered. "I had an idea—"

"The badge of Yorick is an oak-tree." She whispered rather than spoke. "We've never displayed the leopard for more than 200 years."

The sibilant accusation struck me dumb.

She was round now and was kneeling, with her arms held close to her breast and her hands to her throat. Her breath was whistling in her nostrils and her eyes seemed to pierce my brain.

Helplessly I shrugged my shoulders.

"I suppose I must have—"

"My God," she breathed, "you were there." As my eyes went down, she clapped her hands to her head. "My God!" she cried. "It was you! You, John, YOU, and not Bugle that . . ."

I pulled out my note-case and took out her master key.

As I laid it down by her side—

"Sabre killed Bugle," I said. "His body's down in the moat. None of them saw it happen, so I walked into the castle and took his place."

Helena sat back on her heels, finger to lip. Her eyes were still wide, still staring: she seemed to be murmuring something I could not hear.

"I'm sorry," I said. "I didn't mean you to know."

At that a tremor ran through her: then, with a sudden movement, she flung herself down on her face and burst into tears.

For a moment I sat hesitant. Then something snapped within me.

I lifted her up and gathered her into my arms.

With my face pressed tight against hers—

"Don't cry, Nell," I said. "I can't bear it. And—and please don't send me away."

"I'm not sending you away," she sobbed. She caught at my coat. "And I'll tell you another thing. I'd never have let you go. If all else had failed, I was going down to the station."

I held her off and looked into her tear-stained face.

"But, Nell, just now you—"

"I wanted to know if you loved me. I had to be sure of that. But now . . ." She hid her face in my coat. "Oh, John, my darling, you've made me feel so humble, so cheap and—"

I stopped her beautiful mouth.

"How d'you think I felt, Nell? How d'you think I felt when I stood in that secret chamber and heard you buying my safety—the life and health of the man who'd just turned you down?"

A child looked into my eyes.

"Shall we . . . take each other back, John?"

"Yes, please, Nell," I said quietly.

With a little sigh of contentment she slid an arm round my neck.

CHAPTER XII

Storm Music.

Our respective tales had been told, my disaffection forgiven, our grace had been said, and we were now standing together at the edge of the lawn. We had started to return to the car, but now with one consent we had stopped to look again upon the beauty which we were to leave.

It seemed so strange that life and death and fortune had lain in that peaceful setting, awaiting a sweet June dayspring to leap to their battle stations, thence to dispute the fate of six human beings, not one of whom, till that morning, had so much as suspected the existence of such a spot. A century of dawns and sundowns had found and left it sleeping, as it was sleeping now: and then in a twinkling the earth had opened, the brook had played storm music and. . . .

"To think," said Helena, "that I treated you as a child."

"The truth is," said I, "we're both children: and children hate to be treated as children, you know."

Helena lifted her head, to survey the blue of the sky. The eager look in her face would have made a sick man well.

"I wasn't," she said. "I was a woman all right. But I think—it's all your own doing, you know—but I think, my dear, you'll have a child for a wife."

* * * * * * *

There is not much more to be told.

My cousin's reception of the truth was more than handsome: and I really believe that Barley would not have exchanged the knowledge that I had caused Pharaoh's death for all the gold that lay in the cellars of Yorick or anywhere else. But old Florin's simple tribute would have warmed any man's heart.

"Sir, you have done my duty. And that, by the grace of God; for I myself could never have done it so well."

It was he who said at once that Bugle's body would be found held down by the grill which kept foreign matter from passing into the waste-pipes that led from the moat. Sure enough, there it was. Its removal and the subsequent rites were grisly enough: but the four of us did the business without any help, because, having got so far, it seemed a pity that we should explode a theory which Yorick—and Yorick's neighbors—had been at such pains to digest.

When my cousin broached the question of getting rid of the gold, Helena made no objection, but only begged his assistance to carry through a transaction she dared not attempt alone. This to our great surprise, till we learned that her solemn trust was now at an end, because her father had said that on her marriage the gold must be reinvested or lodged at a bank. And this in due course was done. My cousin arranged the affair with a famous house and within six weeks, a fortnight before we were wed, the bullion was out of the cellar and Helena mistress of a fortune which was considerably greater than that which her father laid up.

A letter from the Count of Yorick afforded us infinite pleasure and deserves to be set out in full:—

Dear Helena:

I hope you are very well. I am not at Yorick because I was bitten by a mad dog and a good Sammarrytone brought me straight here. I would like to thank him for that. He saved my life, you know. Fancy a mad dog worrying me. I think I must just have gone out for a walk or something and then it just leeped upon me and worried me and I knew no moar. And this is the only one place that I could have been saved from going mad. It makes you get hot all over. By the way, I'm off liquor. Alcohol, I mean. They make me heeling drinks here with virtue in them and I fairly lapp them up. And the wound's heeling like a little child. They say liquor's very dangerous for hiderofobea. I nearly died, you know. All the wile the good Sammarrytones were taking me to the monnastery, it was touch and go moar than once. The madness was in my vanes. It makes you go hot. But I'm all right now. They say I can get up for a little wile on Sunday and look at the flours. I shall like that. I see the vannity of life now all right. There is a good monk here called Father Bernard. Of course they are all good, but he is the best. He says all is vannity and that the pumps of the world are void. You know there's a lot in that. Well, I must end now. But I thought you might wunder where I was. What a escape! Fancy a mad dog like that ranging about seaking whom he might devower. I tell you, I hadn't a chance. He just leeped upon me, nashing their fangs. I can see it now.

Your loving brother,
VALENTINE.

P. S.

What about Faning? I rather hope he's gone. If not, perhaps you could fire him out. He swore Spencer was your evil genie, but I thought Spencer had a good eye. Sour grapes, I guess. I suppose you knew what you were doing.

The reformation this letter foreshadowed was more than we could believe, but I am bound to record that it was fairly fulfilled. The shock or the fear of death or, perhaps, his curious communion with that honest and kindly fellowship of simple souls wrought in the count an astonishing change of heart. The weeds that had choked his qualities withered and died, and though I was most apprehensive of our relation, 24 hours' acquaintance had made us the best of friends.

His postcript brings me to Pharaoh.

Of that unconscionable scoundrel I have but little to say. That the man was most swift and daring I cannot deny, but I think that his deadly reputation was to him the highwayman's mare. When at last he was standing upon his own feet, even I was able to show that, if his eye was quicker, at least his spine was as brittle as that of another man.

The portrait my cousin had painted will always rank for me as one of the greatest triumphs a painter ever achieved. This is not because he had rendered a beautiful likeness, nor yet because he had captured the leaping spirit that lived in the lovely flesh; but because he had marked, as I had, that the precious eager look was out of his subject's face and had painted it in from memory out of a grateful heart.

Though my life is secure and happy beyond belief, the events of those terrible days are cut as in stone upon my mind. But I would not forget them, if I could: for out of their wrack and turmoil I won my beautiful wife. Often and often I read their grim inscription and gaze at the riotous pageant which this calls up. I see that dreadful labor down in the sparkling dell and Dewdrop finger the paper that I let fall: I tread The Reaping Hook's stairs and I hear—as I shall hear to my dying day—the deadly voice of Pharaoh behind the door: I see him enter the room with Valentine's hand upon his shoulder and I hear him whistling for Sabre with my heart in my mouth: I hear the Carlotta coming with the rush of a mighty wind, and I hear the cough of the Rolls as her engine failed: I hear Rush plying Bugle to make my blood run cold, I hear Pharaoh bullying Freda, and I see the flame of the pistol that saved his life: I see the awful change in my darling's face, and I turn to see Pharaoh smiling behind my back: I smell the fragrance of the valley that knew no sun: and then I see her stricken and trembling in Pharaoh's power, and I hear the roar of our pistols and I see the man spent with hatred, staring into my eyes. . . .

It is written, Out of the eater came forth meat. I can only say I have found this saying most true. The goddess Aphrodite rose from the foam of the sea: but Helena Spencer came out of the wrath of a tempest that had risen to smite us both. Together, saving each other, we rode out that frightful storm—the remembrance of which is not grievous, for our desperately perilous passage, side by side, has bound us more closely together than the sharing of any joys.

160,000 Horses
A New Democracy
Thin Men Live Longer
Must We Have War?

The well advertised Queen Mary, looking very big moving up to her New York dock, represented in reality the quintessence of compressed power. On the way over she developed one hundred and sixty thousand horse power.

Arthur Brisbane

That number of horses hitched in pairs, one ahead of the other, would make a "team" more than two hundred and fifty miles long. Still more remarkable power compression is that of the flying engine, which compresses the power of a 1,000-pound horse into less than three pounds of metal.

The government offered for sale six hundred millions of 2¾ per cent bonds, four hundred millions of 1⅜ per cent notes. The whole issue is oversubscribed.

It is a comfort for those that have money and want no risk to invest even at low interest rates, free of income tax payments.

Such an investment is much simpler than running the risk of a business enterprise with pay rolls and jobs attached.

To tax heavily the man who uses his money and brains to give work to others, and free from taxation those that buy bonds and take their ease, is a brand-new kind of democracy.

Men of middle age and older may learn from Civil war veterans in the Memorial day parade, some ninety and some ninety-three; one, who led New York city's G. A. R. procession, past ninety-six years of age.

All the old soldiers are very thin men, averaging in weight less than 140 pounds. Had they been fat they would be in the grave, not in any parade.

General Pershing cut a big birthday cake with a general's sword, Mrs. Roosevelt looking on, and on Memorial day he warned America against another war.

To believe that this country can be dragged into a war without a repetition of our big war folly is not complimentary to those in charge. No foreign nation would force war on the United States, and thus put United States resources, and any fighting qualities that Americans may possess, on the side of that foreign nation's enemies.

The unfortunate congressman, Zioncheck, from the Northwest, is locked up in Washington, his sanity to be investigated, after he visited the White House with a present of empty beer bottles for the President.

The unfortunate congressman's antics are not important in themselves, but you wonder what qualities were seen in him by the voters.

The United States Supreme court declared unconstitutional a New York state law that would permit New York to fix a minimum wage for women and children.

Chief Justice Hughes, who did not agree with the majority opinion, wrote: "I find nothing in the federal Constitution which denies to the state the power to protect women from being exploited by over-reaching employers."

Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., who ought to know about American industry, says enormous building operations are needed in the United States to replace out-of-date equipment, and that the door is wide open for "plenty of jobs and then more jobs."

American cotton growers fighting the boll weevil will sympathize with Argentine growers, attacked by vast swarms of devouring locusts, far worse than any weevil. The Argentine ministry of agriculture announces 10,000 tons of cotton devoured, 60,000 acres invaded.

Farmers fight the locusts by erecting walls of sheet iron or digging ditches, into which the locusts swarm, to be sprayed with gasoline and burned. Tons of the pests are thus destroyed.

Mayors of Arab cities in Palestine warn the British that they must stop Jewish immigration and the sale of land to Jews in Palestine. The British answer to the warning will probably not be satisfactory to the Arabs. It is reported also that the central committee for Palestine of the "Communist party" is distributing literature urging British soldiers in Palestine to mutiny.

The national Socialist convention in Cleveland, formulating "immediate demands," denounces the New Deal, demands a revision of the Constitution and an end of what is called the "usurped power" of the Supreme court. In all these matters, others were ahead of the Socialists.

President Lewis, of Lafayette college, thinks wars would end if monarchs who voted for it were put in front line trenches. That might prevent some wars, not all.

Uncle Phil Says:

Aspire to Humility

Aspiring to nothing but humility, the wise man will make it the height of his ambition to be unambitious. As he cannot effect all that he wishes, he will only wish for that which he can effect.

Best after dinner speech at home is praise of the dinner.

Every night count your blessings. Every morning count yesterday's mistakes and be careful.

Happiness Is Inexpensive

Savages really have the most unalloyed happiness. Unlike the civilized, they don't care how cheap their strings of beads are.

He must be a pretty good sort of man who has accomplished half the things he intended to do.

Pretense Most Painful

Poverty is not so painful as pretense. When we have what is wanted to make us comfortable, all the rest is vanity, excess and envy.

Children have such good health, no wonder it is hard to control them. Be glad that they are vigorous, anyway.

Time Limit Will Be Extended Graciously

Bill Brawnley, the strong man of the village, met one of his fellow-villagers in the local inn the other evening. During their conversation Bill called the other man a liar. The villager naturally resented this remark.

"Look here, Brawnley," he said, "I'll give you just five minutes to take that back."

Bill smiled.

"Is that so," he replied, extending his chest impressively and advanced to where his fellow-creature stood. "And suppose I don't take it back inside of five minutes?"

"Then," said the villager after a slight pause, "I'll extend the time a bit."—London Answers.

A Republican Takes A Walk

"I have never voted for a Democratic President. This year, however, I shall vote for Franklin D. Roosevelt."

Thus a distinguished journalist and author, Stanley High begins an article, in the Forum magazine, entitled, "A Republican Takes A Walk." Some of the New Deal's measures, he thinks, may be unsound, others may have been unwisely administered; but, "I am convinced that the purpose back of the New Deal policies is right. The purpose is to make room in the American system for practices designed to provide a more widespread security for the masses of the American people..... I am as sure now as when the depression began that we must have an economic overhauling, lest recovery lead only to a more serious economic collapse. And Franklin D. Roosevelt represents the only visible leadership working for that overhauling."

The Republicans and the anti-Roosevelt Democrats, Mr. High observes, do not admit that they are against the security, the justice and the human progress for which the president works; but they oppose what he has done and is doing to attain those desirable ends. Nor do they offer a constructive policy or adequate program of their own. Now that they have recovered from the fright of a few years ago, they are for going back to the old precarious and unjust order of things out of which the depression sprang. If we are to go forward, it must be under the Roosevelt leadership.

This statement of the really vital issue of 1936 by a hitherto regular Republican is grounded in common sense and common patriotism. All that the opposition offers is negative or vague. In Georgia, for example, it denounces or criticizes in blanket terms, but it says nothing about the fifteen thousand homes and the nineteen thousand farms which the New Deal has saved from foreclosure in our commonwealth; nothing about the three and a half million dollars in delinquent taxes which have been paid to our state, county and city governments as a result of New Deal assistance to hard pressed property owners; nothing about the one hundred and fifteen thousand crop loans which have been rehabilitated; nothing about the fifteen hundred schoolhouses which have been built with New Deal aid, nor the one hundred and twenty-seven water-works and the one hundred and twelve sewer systems thus constructed nothing about the multitudes saved from starvation; nothing about the new opportunity, the new confidence and courage that have come to hundreds of thousands of Georgians from the humane and practical statesmanship of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The critics dare not propose to blot out these benefits; but they propose to tear down the administration that made the benefits possible. They do not say, "Let us return to the fear, the suffering, the danger that gripped the country in the early months of 1933," but they say, "Let us repudiate the leader who mastered that crisis and captained the way to the good times of 1936." Such an attitude is repugnant to the American sense of what is reasonable and fair. It may appeal to certain partisan interests and to certain reactionary groups, but not to the just-minded rank and file.

—The Atlanta Journal.

Ed Wynn told the following story during a recent broadcast:

A woman wanted to know how to use a thermometer in getting ready the baby's bath.

"Oh," Wynn replied, "you don't need a thermometer at all. Just draw the bathtub half full of water and put the baby in it. If the baby turns red, the water's too hot. If he turns blue, the water's too cold. If he turns white, he needed the bath.'

VACATIONS

Probably two-thirds of working America now is doing a little concentrating on the subject of a vacation and where to spend it. It is disruption time in the business office. The machine i required to run with missing cogs. Practically all of the younger generation must have a vacation. Two weeks off during the working year is now regarded as an indispensable gap in the routine. Some 30 years ago nobody had a vacation except the farmers. When they laid by their crops, it was all over until the harvest. Other classes worked on through the year's four seasons.

The modern vacation cannot be called an unmixed blessing, neither can it be proven that a vacation improves efficiency or results in "better work." These are merely pleasant claims to justify these intervals in the regular rounds.

The vacationer sometimes complains that he spends all the money in two weeks which he has been able to save in 50 weeks, and then comes home to dodge his accumulated bills. He thinks he has had a good time and his wife tells the neighbors it was simply grand.

Civil Service Examinations

The United States Civil Service Commission has announced open competitive examinations as follows:

Assistant petroleum engineer, $2,600 a year, Geological Survey.

Teacher in community school (primary, intermediate, special or opportunity, or one-teacher day), $1,620 a year, Indian Field Service (including Alaska.)

Statistical analysis (transportation various grades, $3,200 to $5,600 a year, Bureau of Statistics, and Bureau of Motor Carriers, Interstate Commerce Commission.

Assistant superintendent of brush factory, $3,200 a year, foreman of brush factory, $2,600 a year, United States Penitentiary Annex, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

Full information may be obtained from the Secretary of the United States Civil Service Board of Examiners at the post office or custom house in any city which has a post office of the first or the second class or from the United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.

MY BONUS

I've made a list of all the things
I really want to buy
When bonus bonds come rolling home
Along about July.

Debts first are on my list,
Then clothes and car and such.
I find that after adding up
I really haven't much.

This bonus thing has made me think
Just what t's really for
Of course I know it helps repay
The hardships of war.

I know that God protected me
From one day to another
I know that prayers and thoughts were there
Each day and night, from mother.

I think the nearest thing to God,
Through war and trials and joy,
Is just the love my mother had
For me—her soldier boy.

So, mother dear, I'll save a bond
(I'll try and make it two),
That you may know in this small way
It was not I—but you.

I wish there were a medal
Of gems and solid gold
That governments would cast and give
Before you grow too old.

For after all, it's not my own,
Though debts and wants seem great,
Or selfish plea, that I should hold
That profit I can make.

Forgive me if I've tried to say
That I can never half repay
Your love, with just a bond or two,
I've tried to say, in my small way,
You head my list—I'll make it too.

"Yesterday's news is dead
So let it lay.
Concern yourself then,
With news of today.
Yesterday's papers are sold.
They told their stories.
Today must deal with
Other faded hopes or glories
Let not the news of yesterday
Concern your mind.
TODAY is the day to think about
YESTERDAY is far behind.
Forget the past
The present and the future hold
The hidden rainbow ends—
That pot of gold."

So we begin another day, another week, another page! Yesterday is DEAD. Last week's issue is DEAD! Life, however, in a busy newspaper office goes on, and scooping news is the order of the day. Interesting things about folk whom you and I know becomes our happy task to enumerate—so here goes!

POLITICS ON MAIN STREET

The political fabric of Shelby County's First District has, for the past few months presented a colorful tapestry. It has been intensely interesting to the writer as we have daily watched the weaving of this intricate pattern, woven and interwoven with Dame Rumor's unreliable tirade—plus the facts and direct contact with some things presented which we found terrifically hard to unravel or understand during the hectic contest. INTERESTING? Did we say?. Yes but we can truthfully assure you, we are delighted to reach the "calm level of the sea" this morning. We found the political sea, lashed into fury and tossed into spray, an impressive sight, but the scattering of the billows and the calm level of the turbulent stream, is the measurement we should like to personally employ for a more lasting and sane judgment of our fellow citizens. In other words, it is the "hour of calm" after the storm that marks the more healthful pulse of your little old Main Street and Mine this morning—that impresses me. The tension of the past few weeks has vanished, and the friendly sunlight again sheds its radiance over friends and former opponents—who have engaged in this political combat. We have personally had the privilege of extending to our good friend, Thomas Minor, our sincere congratulations upon his winning the nomination for Member of Board of Revenue. We have also joined legions of citizens in declaring C. R. Tinney, incumbent, one of the best losers we have ever seen. It is a distinct compliment to a fellow to b ecalled a "good loser." Mr. Tinney has proven that he "can take it" by his spontaneous and generous acceptance of your verdict on yesterday and his genuine good sportsmanship evidenced this morning.

Prominent leaders from both sides have made the writer a happier fellow comrade by personal visits to my office this morning. There have been outstretched hands bespeaking continued friendship proffered by those, whose loyalty and interest has blessed my pathway here—and we are more firmly convinced than we have heretofore been, that COLUMBIANA'S fights are only FRIENDLY ENCOUNTERS and there remains, when the smoke of the battle has vanished, no prejudice nor malicious vindictiveness, nor verbal wounds that cannot quickly heal—after the emotional tempo has regained normalcy between the participants In other words, and to make a long story short—Another page in the political history of District Number 1 has been turned. If there have been unpleasant episodes written, when we review this little human document, we shall quickly turn the page, and never return to view its contents. We shall forget, in this instance, as we have done in other instances—things we do not LIKE to remember. In this way only, have we ever found any degree of satisfaction or happiness. We have, occasionally indulged in a retrospective mood regarding PEOPLE and things, but we have never found it difficult to dismiss from our mental laboratory the above mentioned "articles" when the "Experiment" didn't work—and we did not care to REMEMBER! The only thing that now worries us is—since the POLITICAL issues have been settled—The REVIVAL closed—and "It Ain't Gonna Rain No More"—what are we going to do as far as "Something to talk or write about is concerned.

The many friends of Mrs. Max Lefkovits regret to learn of her illness in her home in Columbiana.

Dr. Joel Chandler has been seriously ill for the past week, but his legions of friends and patients through out the wide area which he so capably serves as physician and benefactor, will be delighted to learn that he is steadily improving at his home in Columbiana.

A. D. Gordon and Ruth Luck were present at Kay Kyser's dance on Saturday night.

We are missing our business neigh bor and friend, Frank Baker, who is confined to his home on account of ill ness.

Joe Williams, who has been spending the winter with his father in Birmingham, attending school, has returned to the home of his grand parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Pitts where he will spend his summer vacation.

....

The "GIBSON GIRL" has long been famed in pictorial circles and in stories, but Columbiana is this week entertaining a petite brunette by the name of Miss Gibson from Troy, Alabama, whose beauty and charm out rivals the immortal popularity of the above mentioned model. Miss Gibson is the guest of her sister, Mrs. E. H. Childs and we acknowledge happily, a personal visit from Misses Gibson and Mary Moore Hurst in our office this morning.

Pep Curlee spent the past week at home.

Mr. Gray Goodwin was at home over the week end.

CARD OF THANKS

I desire to personally extend my deep appreciation to my friends throughout District Number One who so loyally supported me in my race for re-election as Member of Board of Revenue, and to express my sincere gratitude for their untiring efforts in my behalf, and I further wish to extend my congratulations to my opponent, Thomas Minor who won the nomination, and pledge my personal support to his administration.

Heart Drifts

A DEFINITION

You ask me, What is LOVE? It is a craving
To spin the dawdling globe with a flicked finger
Till meeting come, and then
To slow it down again
To a snail pace, with desperate hands cleaving
To its painted sides, that joy may last the longer.

It is to go all day with a lamp shining
In your heart; to which when comes a pause from labor
Or when the numbing crowd
Drifts for awhile aside,
You find yourself like a moth to a candle turning
To warm your thoughts at its white and secret ardour.

—J. S.

WAGES

Oh, love will bring you golden joys,
But you must always pay
The debt you owe with willing wage
At the end of every day.

He is a miser, and if you
Hold back a coin or CHEAT,
He will leave you naked, begging
Upon a LONELY street.

THE BLOSSOMING

We weep for days turned barren.
Yet who knows
Under what breast the sap of beauty flows?
It is the leafless boughs that often bring
The first white petals of awakening spring.

—Coblent.

LIFE'S LITTLE DAY

Pain, tears and joy—
Morning
And nest-time.

Play, toil and dreams—
Noonday
And test-time.

Love, hope and fears—
Evening
And rest-time.

Sleep, death and dust—
Midnight—
And quest-time.

—John Moreland.

WHAT YOU ARE TO ME

BELOVED, you are to me
What the dawn is to the lark,
What the wind is to the sea,
What the stars are to the dark.

Calm after turmoil,
Peace after pain,
Sabbath after long toil,
Clear skies after rain.

—Contributed.

CARD OF THANKS

The gratitude I feel for friends who so loyally rendered me their influence and active support in my efforts to win the Democratic nomination for Member of the Board of Revenue from District Number 1, cannot be expressed in words.

I can only state that if I am chosen as your representative in the General Election to be held in November, that I shall conscientiously attempt to faithfully discharge every duty this responsible position demands for the good of the entire section.

Married People Are Healthier and Live Longer, Study Shows

Death Rate Is Highest Among Single Persons

NEW YORK.—If you want to live long and be healthy, get married.

Figures showing that the married state, whether blissful or not, is at least a healthy one are reported in the current issue of the Metropolitan Life Insurance company's Statistical Bulletin.

"Marriage, apparently, is conducive to long life and good health," the report states. "At any rate, married men and women live longer than do single persons, and married people register lower death rates from nearly all the important causes of death than do bachelors or spinsters.

Results of Study.

"We would expect these findings to emerge from any statistical study of mortality according to conjugal condition, for married persons constitute a selected group. 'The lame, the halt, and the blind' do not marry, as a rule. Nevertheless, the differences between the respective death rates of wedded and single persons are so large that this factor of selection can be only a partial explanation of them.

"It would seem that the relatively staid and regular course of married life is more conducive to health than are the comparatively free and easy ways of the unmarried.

Bachelors' Death Rate.

"Among males over fifteen years of age, the standardized death rate for bachelors is 1,218.2 per 100,000 as compared with 855.9 for married men.

"Among females the standardized death rate of spinsters is 1,039.1, as against 856.6 for the married of all ages."

The death rates for influenza, pneumonia, tuberculosis, chronic heart disease, kidney disease, apoplexy, ulcer of the stomach, alcoholism and suicide are appreciably higher among the single than the married, showing that ways of life among the single are not so healthy. Cancer, on the other hand, which so far as known is not subject to control by living habits or environment, except in certain very special cases of industrial hazards, shows relatively little difference in mortality between married and single persons.

Reasons suggested for the healthier and longer life of the married are greater regularity of sleep, meals and recreation; sense of responsibility on the husband's part which makes him avoid known sources of infection and hazardous adventures.

Windshield Filter May Be "Crutch" for Color-Blind Drivers

SEATTLE.—A simple and "infallible" help for the color-blind automobile driver who gets into difficulties because he cannot distinguish between green and red traffic lights is suggested by Thomas Ross of the University of Washington here. In a report to the current issue of Science, Mr. Ross describes a contrivance that can be fitted to the windshield of the color-blind driver's car.

The device consists of small pieces of special glass which can filter out either red or green light. With the red filter placed above the green one, the driver will know that when he sees a light through the top piece of glass he is seeing a red light.

When he sees the light through the bottom piece in this arrangement it is a green light. The device is improved by placing a prism over each filter in such a way that the traffic signal will be visible through both filters at the same time.

Device Is Practical.

This idea has worked in actual trials, Mr. Ross reports. It could be adapted to persons suffering from other types of color-blindness besides the red-green kind.

A variation of the red and green filters is also suggested. One of the color filters, says Mr. Ross, might be perforated and parts of the other set in it like polka dots.

"Thus, if the red filter were perforated and the openings were filled with the green material, a red traffic light or other red object viewed through the resulting filter would appear bright with dark spots. A green object, on the other hand, would appear dark with bright spots. This is a type of discrimination which would be easy for the color-blind person."

Nordic Type Least Numerous in U. S. Scientist Reveals

Nine Different Kinds of Americans Studied

WHAT is an American?

Not a "pure Nordic," typically, said Prof. E. A. Hooton, of Harvard university, answering his own question before the New Haven meeting of the American Association of Physical Anthropologists. Of three good-sized samples of the American population, taken from diverse social and geographic backgrounds, the pure Nordic type averages out by long odds the least numerous—only 2.25 per cent of the total.

The largest groups, in the nine physical types into which Professor Hooton analyzed the American population, are Nordic mixed with something else—Nordic-Mediterranean and Nordic-Alpine. The first of these two types have long heads and darkish coloration; the second have round heads and medium coloration—never either pure blonds or pure brunettes.

Types Classified.

Other physical types added by the Harvard anthropologist to the Nordic-Alpine-Mediterranean racial triad of popular conversation and writing are the Dinaric, a round-headed, medium-colored, narrow-nosed people, mostly Teutonic in modern distribution, and the East Baltic, also round-headed, but blond and wide-nosed. He also recognized as a definite physical racial type the long-headed, red-haired, blue or gray-eyed Keltics.

Professor Hooton took his population samples in three different ways: from a considerable number of prisons, from "ordinary citizen" groups in Boston and Nashville, and from a group of rather highly educated persons who visited the Century of Progress in Chicago.

Especially interesting, in his estimation, is the fact that the racial percentage in each group, whether jailbird, man-in-the-street or highbrow, was just about the same as the percentage in the whole population. That is, a really scientific analysis cannot discern any such thing as racial criminality or racial superiority.

Device Measures Amount of Glare Eyes Can Endure

WASHINGTON.—How much glare can a person's eyes stand? This is the question that a device described in a patent granted here to two Chicago inventors intends to answer accurately and quickly. The inventors are W. A. Mendelsohn and C. F. Shepard.

Called a glarometer (glare measurer), the device creates glares of various intensities, and on a scale tells just what intensity of glare blinds a person's eyes. The readings obtained, state the inventors, "furnish a means whereby colored glasses of proper color and tint may be readily prescribed to protect the eyes of the patient from injurious effects from sun or other too strong or glaring light."

How It Works.

The glarometer, with its bulb and lens, looks like a lantern for projecting picture slides. In front of the lens slide translucent glass screens of frosted or ground glass. They may be colored or tinted. In the center of each screen is a mark.

By turning a knob the light emanating from the bulb can be made as bright as desired or dimmed. As the knob is turned it moves a pointer across a scale which indirectly indicates the glare of the bulb at any moment.

The person whose eyes are being tested looks at the mark on the screen with one or both eyes. The knob is turned to increase the light until the glare from the bulb is so strong that it temporarily blinds the person and causes him to lose sight of the central mark.

Soy Bean Hay for Horses

Soy bean hay happens to be a very good winter roughage for horses and mules, providing it does not make up more than about 50 per cent of the total roughage fed. When bean hay is being fed, the amount of grain in the pods should be taken into consideration and the amount of other grains fed should be adjusted accordingly. Timothy hay, prairie hay, corn fodder or straw may be used to supplement bean hay in the roughage portion of the ration.—Wallaces' Farmer.

Lovely Lace Makes Lovely Brides

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

COMES now fashion's big moment to play up romance and the picturesque for the June bride-to-be is calling, calling for lovely gowns for herself and her attendants that shall group into a "perfect picture" on her wedding day.

What bride is not a "vision of loveliness"? Her gown is so carefully selected and fitted, her veil is made just so—to tune perfectly to her individuality, to drape correctly, at the same time beguilingly over the head and down while the train must hang in just the right proportion and line with the dress.

Many a spring bride this 1936 found the expression of her dream of a vision of loveliness in a lace gown and veil. With its importance in the current fashion picture generally it but follows in the natural sequence of events that lace should become first choice with brides. Now that the early brides have demonstrated how really lovely lace is for the wedding gown, June and midsummer brides-to-be have taken their cue and are enthusiastically planning their trousseaux in terms of beautiful lace.

Not only does the lace gown in itself enhance feminine charm to the utmost but lace for the bride brings up the splendor and richness of former periods, when lace played so important a part in the costumes of historical and royal brides. The fact of the lure of lace for brides was dramatically brought out in a "Bride-of-Two-Centuries" showing recently held in New York, in which fifteen period bridal costumes copied from those worn by prominent ladies in the last two hundred years was the feature. This bridal show was topped by the modern bridal party, done entirely in lace, in shades of azalea pink.

Which brings us to a very important subject—that of the fashion approval of color for the bride instead of the traditional all-white. A modern bride may wear lovely blush pink or ice blue or any tone or tint of her fancy.

One of the attractions of a "lace wedding" is that lace offers every opportunity to work out fascinating color schemes, for this existing flair for lace is not exclusive with the bride but the theme is carried out for bridesmaids as well. One of the newest gestures is that of lace dresses, with cunning lace capes for each bridesmaid.

Brides, too, are looking into the future in the selection of the wedding gown, having in mind a dress that may be worn later to social events. This feature is admirably interpreted in the very chic and lovely gown in the illustration. Since the full long train is detachable at the waist, the dress alone becomes perfect for the cocktail or dinner hour. The sweep of the train, and the smooth silhouette of the gown cut on true princess lines are the more lovely because of the lace of fine alencon of which this bridal gown is designed. The dress with its narrow waist and tailored neckline, buttons all the way down the front. Tulle is used for the veil which falls in a beguiling drape over the face and hangs quite long at the back.

The bride in the foreground chooses exquisite chantilly lace for her gown. It bespeaks an elegance of simplicity in every detail. The effective arrangement of the tulle veil adds greatly to the glory of the "picture."

HER SMART COAT

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Mannish tailoring in suits and coats for grown-up ladies of fashion has its echo in boyish tailoring for the younger miss from toddlers to teen-agers. The cunning little girl here pictured in the double-breasted flannel coat is ready for an outing in the park, in a coat her little brother would envy. Broad lapels and wide notched collar are becoming. Fitted slightly at the waist for chic the coat is roomy and comfortable. Six smart bone buttons, masculine and substantial, trim the high double-breasted closing. This little model is the very sort that little girls are teasing their mothers to buy for them.

PASTEL TONES IN SUMMER TAILLEURS

Summer tailleurs are more fanciful than ever and synthetic fibers either are mixed with wool or replace wool entirely. Thiebaut-Brion has made a specialty of novel fabrics for this type of tailleur. His collection includes several rayon crepes with a woolen appearance and some rayon serges, either plain or chined. Some of his woolen fabrics show the same chine effect produced with twisted rayon yarns that fleck the surface.

There are new mossy crepes with a woolly texture, also a number of pastel-colored fine woolens, spotted with brown or black rayon nubs or tufts. Some of these fabrics have a tweed-like appearance and are seen in very delicate pastel tones, including sweet pea colors.

Lace Dresses Continue to Be Tops at Paris Show

Lace dresses continue to be tops in Paris. They're shown in amazing variety and startling numbers by all the leading designers. To emphasize the importance of this material in the feminine costume, a ball was held recently at the Hotel George V at which only lace dresses were worn. Dull albene laces were much in evidence, particularly in dark shades such as midnight blue, purplish blue, grenat, eggplant and a dark tone of tortoise shell brown.

Evening Sandals

Cutout sandals of gold or silver mostly with high heels are first in evening shoe fashions. It is considered very chic to wear these with very sheer pastel colored hose to either match or contrast with the dress instead of the perennial flesh colored ones.

Beaded Necklaces

Beaded necklaces as wide as collars and taking the place of collars are increasing in importance and desirability.

Lesson for June 14

JESUS CRUCIFIED

LESSON TEXT—Luke 23:33-46.

GOLDEN TEXT—But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.—Romans 5:8.

PRIMARY TOPIC—When Jesus Died for Us.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Savior—Christ the Lord.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus Died for Me.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Meaning of the Cross.

It is highly important that every teacher have the personal experience of Christ's death for himself and then get his pupils to see that Christ's death was instead of their own death. We escape judgment because judgment fell upon Christ. He was made to be sin for us that we might be made the righteousness of God in him (II Cor. 5:21). No one lacking this experience can truly teach this lesson.

I. The Place of Crucifixion (v. 33).

They led him away to Calvary, a hill north of Jerusalem resembling a skull. Calvary is the Latin word, and Golgotha is the Hebrew. This is a most significant name for the place where man's redemption was accomplished. The skull is an apt symbol of man's condition as a result of sin. Life and intelligence are gone, leaving only the dark empty cavern which once contained them.

II. His Companions on the Cross (v. 33).

Two malefactors were crucified with him. This is in fulfillment of the Scriptures: "He was numbered with the transgressors" (Isa. 53:12). Personally, he was sinless, but he became sin for us.

III. His Forgiving Love (v. 34).

He cried, "Father forgive them." He doubtless had in mind not only the soldiers who acted for the government, but the Jews who in their blindness were ignorant of the enormity of their crime. He was absolutely destitute of hatred, even for his betrayer and murderers.

IV. The Revelation of the World (vv. 34-43).

Take a cross section of the world at any time since Christ was crucified, and representatives of the various classes therein were found around Jesus on the cross. The cross is the judgment of this world (John 12:31).

1. The covetous (v. 34). They gambled for his seamless robe where he was dying. This represents those whose primary interest in Christ is a means to get gain. If they had had eyes to see they could have beheld a robe of righteousness being provided in his death.

2. The indifferent (v. 35). "The people stood beholding." They gazed upon him with indifference. The great mass of the world today gazes upon the crucified Christ with stolid indifference.

3. The scoffers (vv. 35-39).

a. The rulers reviled him for his claim to be the Savior. They wanted a Savior but not a crucified one. Many today are religious but have only contempt for a salvation which centers in an atonement made by blood. They uttered a great truth when they said: "He saved others." But he could not save himself and others because God's plan was to save others by giving himself.

b. The soldiers reviled him for claiming to be a king. The title "King of the Jews" had been placed over him in irony. But it was pre-eminently true, for by right of the Davidic covenant, he shall one day be king over Israel (II Sam. 7:8-16). Through his death, he came into the place of Lordship over all who acknowledge him.

c. The impenitent malefactor (v. 39). This brutal man joined in reviling the Savior, even though he himself was under condemnation.

4. The penitent malefactor (vv. 40-43).

The conscious sinner who discerned the heart of the Savior prayed for mercy. The salvation of this penitent man is a remarkable picture of the saving power of Christ. The man confessed his sin as against God and cried to Jesus for salvation. He saw that the dying man was the forgiving God. His salvation was immediate. Christ said: "Today shalt thou be with me in paradise."

V. The Death of Christ (vv. 44-46).

So shocking was this crime that nature herself threw around the Son of God a shroud to hide him from the godless crowd. Darkness was upon the land at noonday. When the price of sin was paid he cried with a loud voice, showing that he still had vitality, that his death was not through exhaustion but by his sovereign will. He died like no other one in all history. He gave up the ghost, that is, dismissed his spirit.

The Soul

I am fully convinced that the soul is indestructible, and that its activity will continue through eternity. It is like the sun, which, to our eyes, seems to set in night; but it has in reality only gone to diffuse its light elsewhere. —Goethe.

Active in Good Works

Beautiful is the activity that works for good, and the stillness that waits for good; blessed the self-sacrifice of the one, and the self-forgetfulness of the other

Tomorrow a New Day

FINISH every day, and be done with it. You have done what you could. Some blunders and absurdities no doubt crept in; forget them as soon as you can. Tomorrow is a new day; begin it well and serenely, and with too high a spirit to be numbed with your old nonsense. Today is all that is good and fair. It is too dear, with its hopes and invitations, to waste a moment on the yesterdays.

Courage is a virtue of no doubtful seeming; there can be no contradiction, no diversity of opinion about it.—Richter.

GIRL SPENDS $70,000 A YEAR

It may be interesting to parents struggling to support families on moderate incomes, to learn that 12 year old Gloria Vanderbilt spends about $70,000 a year to live.

This is the little girl whose custody was the subject of a bitter legal battle between her mother and her aunt. She has an estate of nearly $4,000,000 and, apparently, is entitled ot spend $70,000 a year if her family can find opportunities to use that much money.

Mos tmen will go to any amount of trouble to be able to have a good time.

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

* * *

I have been thinking for some time, if it would be possible for the Scouts here in Shelby County to have some sort of a rally or just a general get together. It doesn't make any particular difference what we call it. The idea is to get to know one another better.

Maybe it would be possible for us to just have a County-Wide Scout meeting, with all the Troops in the County represented. We could have a special program planned and if pos sible hold it in the open. We may even combine this with a weiner roast or something similar.

For those boys who don't happen to have a uniform we might make the occasion more colorful by having them dress as Indians or Pioneers. Then we could issue special invitations for all boys who are not Boy Scouts to attend and thereby stimulate their Scouting interest and encourage them to join the worlds largest boy organization.

Each Troop could have a special pro gram prepared for the entertainment of the other Troops attending. It may even be possible for us to award a prize for the Troop presenting the best stunt or the best form of entertainment.

Now let's take a vote on this. I am counting on the Scribe of each Troop in the County to take a sheet of paper and go to each boy in the Troop and if he is interested in this and wants to see it go over in a big way, have him sign his name on the sheet and then the Scribe will send it to me and further plans will be developed.

I will offer suggestions from time to time and keep you posted on all new plans developed.

The following men and boys are the ones I am counting on in a big way: Scoutmaster Mr. Kendrick, Assistant S. M. Alvin Houston, Gordon Wood, Bob Broadhead and Eugene Booth of Maylene; Hoye Splawn, James Wooley, Robert Adams, Wins ton Hogan, Clay Lucas, Willard Mil stead, J. W. Ward, W. H. Myorery Henry Winslett, James Edwards, Fre drick Lucas, Fred Adams, J. C. McCulley, Earl Beasley all of Wilton, and James Leonard, Luther McGiboney, Perry Letson, Jack Letson and Bill White and Harry Dover of Columbiana. Nathan Maudling, John A Kent, Troy Henderson Jr., of Siluria Donald Vaughn and Bob Anderson of Montevallo. Ed Dennis of Pelham Luther Nunally of Helena and all others whom I have not named who will assist us in this rally.

Remember fellows it doesn't make any difference whether or not your town has a Scout Troop, we want you to be there.

How about it fellows, can I count on you? Are we goin to make a whaling success of it? I will be ex pecting those names as soon as you scribes can possibly get them it.

Wilton Troop Notes

The Wilton Scouts met Friday night at the School House. Hoye Splawn, our Scoutmaster, was taken into the Troop as a Tenderfoot in order to better learn all the Scout Requirements. James Smitherman was voted as a candidate for membership and will be taken into the Troop on his twelfth birthday.

Robert Adams was transferred from Troop 138 of St. Louis to our Troop.

A lively game of "Spud" was play ed and greatly enjoyed by everyone present. Any Troop is invited to attend a meeting of the Wilton Troop at the Wilton School, Friday seven P. M.

'CAPTAIN BLOOD' AND HIS PIRATES STRAND SUNDAY

Rafael Sabatini's famous and color ful story of romance and adventure, "Captain Blood", which Cosmopolitan Productions has filmed on a gigantic scale, come to the Strand Theatre in Montevallo on Sunday and Monday as a First National release.

This thrilling tale of seventeenth century sea pirates is said to be one of the most elaborate and pretentious productions in screen history. Tremendous settings were designed by master builders.

These include great sailing vessels of the period, massive in size and full batteried, which had to be specially built, complete in every detail; parts of a village in England; most of the old city of Port Royal, in the West Indies, destroyed by earthquake King James II's palace; a governor's man sion; and costumes to suit everyone from King to slave.

Playing to title role of "Captain Blood" is Errol Flynn, a handsome and dashing young Irishman, who was recruited from the London stage. The feminine lead is played by Olivia de Havilland, the beautiful young girl who was skyrocketed to fame when chosen for a leading role in "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

The story opens with the Monmouth rebellion against King James II of England. Young Peter Blood, a physician, who although he had no part in the rebellion, is sentenced to slavery.

HENRY B. WALTHALL DIES WEDNESDAY

We deeply regret to hear, from the Press News Review, over radio, that Henry B. Walthall, native of Shelby County, who won fame and fortune in the Motion Picture Field, making his reputation immortal by his excellent portrayal of the Little Colonel in The Birth of a Nation, died suddenly at his home in California. Mr. Walthall had been in ill health for some time, but his condition was not regarded as serious.

Mr. Walthall is survived by his wife, the former Mary Charleston, a daughter, Patricia, of Los Angeles, Cali., one brother, Wallace Walthall, of Dallas, Tex., and two sisters, Mrs. W. J. Ashton of Boothton and Mrs. Luther Etheridge of Glendale, Cali.

Alabama May Lose Extension Funds

AUBURN—Dr. L. N. Duncan, director of the State Extension Service has officially notified all State extension workers, including county men and women farm agents, that Alabama will lose its allotment of Federal funds for the State Extension Service unless definite provision is made to meet the requirements of the Federal Government in the matching of Federal funds.

He also has given notice that the ten million dollars or more, which the farmers of the State should receive under the new Agricultural Conservation program will be greatly endangered unless the Federal extension funds are matched.

In making the official anouncement Dr. Duncan quoted statements from Dr. C. W. Warburto, director of the United States Extension Service, Washington, D. C., showing that Alabama cannot be allotted any Federal funds for extension work for the fiscal year July 1, 1936 to June 30, 1937, unless the Federal funds are matched by State funds as provided by the Federal acts.

Dr. Duncan did not make any suggestions as to how to solve the problem, except to say to extension workers:

"It is exceedingly important that you make these facts known at your earliest opportunity to the farm men and women leaders and other citizens of the several counties in order that these pople may take such steps as they may deem wise and proper with reference to the matter.

STATE ROADS GET MORE U. S. CASH

Another $2,500,000 of Federal funds for road construction in Alabama is now practically "in the bag" according to information brought back from Washington recently by President Gaston Scott, of the State High way Commission, who has been at the national capitol for the past week on official business.

The making available of the additional $2,500,000 of road funds for this State will, it is understood, be authorized under the bill by Congressman A. H. Carmichael, which provides that in states having highway toll bridges and desiring to free them, the Federal Government will match on a 50-50 basis any and all funds raised by those states or any of them for the "freeing" process.

According to Mr. Scott, final passage of the Carmichael bill by Congress had been scheduled for the day following the death of Speaker Byrns. It was delayed by the recess taken after the Speaker's death, but will be passed, Mr. Scott said, when Congress reconvenes on June 15.

In Alabama, $5,000,000 of bonds were issued and sold by the State Bridge Corporation to finance construction of the 15 toll bridges that were subsequently built and have been in operation for years. No part of the original cost of these bridges was, there, paid by the Government in Washington. That being the case it is understood. Alabama can fully qualify to receive half of the $5,000,000 spent, or $2,500,000.

Financing of the bridges has already been entirely taken care of by the State, in other words, paying the bonds sold to furnish the financing is already assured through legal machinery already provided; and the State is at liberty to use the 2,500,000 to which it is entitled under the Carmichael bill, for building roads.

Though the other alternative is, of course, presented, of using that sum to pay off but $1,530,000 of the $3,780,000 of the bridge bonds still outstanding, the State will, it is understood, elect to use it for road construction, provision having already been made for refinancing the remaining bonds and freeing the bridges.

Miss Beatrice Looney is at home after spending several weeks in Birmingham.

NEW STEAM PLANT PUT IN OPERATION

Because of the severe drouth thru out Alabama the No. 2 or new Gorgas steam plant of the Alabama Power Company, on the warrior River in Walker County, was placed in operation Sunday.

It is estimated that 1,000 tons of coal per day will be required for operations at the plant which will continue for several months.

Herbert .S Salmon, president of Alabama Coals, Inc., upon hearing of this gave out the following statement.

"Upon my return to Birmingham I heard good news for Alabama Coal miners. The Gorgas steam plant of the Alabama Power Company will resume operations Sunday requiring more than 1,000 tons of coal per day It probably will be kept in operation for several months.

When we realize that the use of Alabama coal for all industrial uses has shrunk to less than 2,000,000 tons per year we realize than 1,000 tons per day is an important increase of more than 20 per cent in the consumption of this kind of Alabama Coal. The coal mine and railroad employees engaged in producing and transporting the coal, the merchants and other business concerns of Alabama, especially those located in Jasper and other towns in that section may well rejoice at this good news.

Heart Drifts

STRENGTH

All winter I have watched a single leaf
Cling to its stem. Winds have not set it free.
Through silent starlit nights and days as brief
As passions hour, it clings tenaciously
The elements have sought in vain to pry
The fragile fingers loose, to break its hold;
In silhouette it rests against the sky,
A bit of filigree in russet gold.

My heart has clung to you through changing years—
No rain of circumstances or storm of doubt
Has loosed my faith in you. No gust of tears
Or adverse wind has blown love's candle out,
Today I give thanks for each treasured thing:
Courage and laughter and the strength to cling.

—Eaton

DEVOTEE TO DUTY

She clothes herself in raiment
As somber as the night;
She seeks hard tasks in payment
For doing only right.

She always thinks of duty
Before the other things—
And found the rigid beauty
That such a living brings.

It does not bring her SINGING,
Nor does it make her GAY
It helps her bear the stinging
Of thorns along the way.

—Avalon.

MANSIONS

He who would make his mansion strong
Builds out of clay and stone,
But he who rears a tower of SONG
Fashions from DREAMS alone.

Fashions from sun and meadow gold,
Leaves, and the arching sky,
Clasped in the pale and weightless hold
Of a poet's tear or sigh.

—Coblentz

ANOTHER DAY

Current with my waking
There are thoughts of you
Like keen daggers finding
Flesh and stabbing through.

Like a silver sword blade
Cutting dreams away,
Laying bare my being
To another day.

To a world of angles
Cruelly defined:
Fears that crush the spirit,
FACTS that crush the mind.

Only with my DREAMING
Do you come to stay—
Can I tread Golgotha
Yet another day?

Hay Mowed at Correct Stage Makes Best Feed

AUBURN—At what stage of grow th and development should cowpeas, soybeans, alfalfa, lespedeza, and grasses be cut to make the best hay?

"Based on research and practical experience," answers E. O. Pollock, extension hay specialist, U. S. D. A., "it appears that alfalfa should be cut for hay when from one-tenth to one-fourth in bloom, or about the time the first basal shoots appear; soybeans between the time the seeds begin to form and when the are half developed; lespedeza when in full bloom; cowpeas when the first pods begin to turn yellow from maturity, but before any of the pods mature enough to shatter their seed during handling; Johnson grass when the first heads appear from the boot; and miscellaneous grasses not later than full bloom.

Mr. Pollock states that late cutting "not only results in actual loss of protein but the hay becomes less palatable and more difficult to digest The quality of many excellent crops of hay is virtually sacrified after the hay is ready for harvest because of late cutting, he says.

News Review of Current Events the World Over

Landon Is Republican Nominee—Britain May Alter Sanctions Policy—Mussolini Makes Sweeping Changes in Cabinet.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

IN ONE of the greatest demonstrations of popular acclaim in the history of American politics, Gov. Alfred M. Landon was nominated for President of the United States by the Republican national convention meeting in Cleveland.

Gov. Landon

Nominated on the first ballot, Governor Landon received the unprecented number of 984 out of a possible 1,003 votes. The nomination was made unanimous. Although his name had not been placed in nomination, Senator William E. Borah of Idaho received 19 votes, including 18 from the Wisconsin delegation and one from West Virginia.

Col. Frank Knox of Chicago, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, was nominated for Vice President on the ticket, receiving the unanimous vote of the delegates.

Party unity and harmony were the watchwords of the delegates. The action of the three other leading candidates for the Presidential nomination—Col. Frank Knox of Chicago, Senator Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan and Senator Borah—in withdrawing in Landon's favor paved the way for a militant and united front in the coming campaign by the Republican party.

The convention adopted a platform of "Americanism," pledging a broad farm relief program, repeal of reciprocal tariff bargaining, the elimination of monopolies and opposition to American entry into the League of Nations and the World court.

Condemning "waste and extravagance" of the Democratic administration, the platform declares for economy by reduced expenditures and for a balanced budget. Adequate relief for the unemployed and co-operation of the states is provided. The platform demands the repeal of the present social security program for a simplified "pay-as-you-go" old-age pension plan. Without proposing a constitutional amendment, it pledges support to states' minimum wage and working hour laws, abolition of sweatshops and child labor, improvement of working conditions and the right of labor to bargain. It calls for restoration and maintenance of the merit system in civil service, regulation of business by a tribunal whose actions would be subject to court review and federal supervision of interstate utilities.

The platform demands adequate national defense, right of free enterprise without competition by government, free speech, pledges care of the veterans and calls for efforts to collect the defaulted war debts.

Governor Landon in a telegram read to the convention by his campaign manager, John Hamilton, placed his own interpretation on certain planks in the platform. Under the title of labor he advocated a Constitutional amendment permitting the states to adopt legislation necessary to protect women and children in the matter of maximum hours, minimum wages and working conditions, provided it is not possible to do so under the Constitution as it now stands.

He likewise advocated a currency expressed in terms of gold and convertible into gold, adding: "I recognize, however, that this requisite must not be made until and unless it can be done without penalizing our domestic economy and without injury to our producers of agricultural products and other raw materials."

Concerning the merit system in civil service, he suggested that it should include every position in the administrative service below the rank of assistant secretaries of major departments and should cover the entire Post Office department.

IN A long expected cabinet shake-up in Italy, Premier Mussolini gave out three of his eight portfolios. There are 15 posts in the cabinet. Il Duce appointed his son-in-law, Count Galeazzo Ciano, as foreign minister. Ciano, only thirty-three, is the world's youngest foreign minister. He moved up from the cabinet post of propaganda. Mussolini also gave up the ministries of colonies and corporations, these posts going respectively to Ferruccia Lantini and Alesandro Lessona. Count Ciano's former ministry was taken by Diono Alfieri. Giuseppe Bastianini, ambassador to Poland, was made undersecretary for foreign affairs. He is only thirty-seven.

Mussolini

The action of Il Duce gave rise to talk of his successor. Observers pointed out that because of the importance of the post of foreign minister, Ciano is believed to be in closest succession to Mussolini.

Elsewhere in the world governments were experiencing changes. In Nicaragua, Dr. Carlos Brenes Jarquin, completing the unexpired term of the deposed President, Dr. Juan B. Sacasa, announced his cabinet. The cabinet included Dr. Luis Manuel Debayle, minister of foreign relations; Dr. Geronimo Ramirez Brown, prime minister; Jose Roman Gonzales, minister of public works; Benito Ramiriz, minister of finance; Dr. Lorenzo Guerrero, minister of education; Dr. Roberto Gonzalez, minister of health; Dr. Alejandro Sequeira Rivas, sanitary director.

LARGER loaves of bread at no increase in price to the consumer were being offered by leading baking company chains selling their product in large cities of the United States. One company increased the size of its 10 cent loaf by 25 per cent, and another by 15 per cent. The saving to consumers was made possible by the invalidation of the AAA processing tax, according to an official of a baking company. The tax was 30 cents a bushel on wheat, he said, and was reflected in an increase of from $1.28 to $1.40 a barrel for flour.

At the same time, the threat of a possible potato famine, due to drouth that is seriously curtailing crops in the Southeast, caused uneasiness among housewives. Prices rose precipitately, but eased off, because immediate demand from consumers declined. The seriousness of the situation was reflected in reports from the crop division of the Department of Agriculture that unless rains fell soon an acute shortage will boost the price of potatoes. The carry-over this year was small, it was revealed, and Maine reported only 100 carloads of last year's holdover on hand. While weather conditions up to the middle of July will determine the extent of the shortage, it was believed by farm experts that the later crops will meet the August and September demands.

DEATH came to John Hays Hammond, eighty-one, internationally-famed mining engineer, economist and writer, at his home at Gloucester, Mass. He had lived a life high in adventure and rich in experiences. He was a friend and confidant of Theodore Roosevelt, Mark Twain, H. Rider Haggard, Cecil Rhodes and many other figures celebrated in world history in the past half century.

John Hays Hammond

Mr. Hammond was born in San Francisco, California, in 1855 where his parents settled after the Mexican war in which his father served as a major. It was the era of the spectacular California gold rush. He watched miners pan for gold dust as a boy. After graduation from Yale he set himself up as a mining engineer. Soon he visited the west coast of Mexico, believing it could be developed as a mining country.

He became known as an expert judge of mining property and was sent to South Africa by "Barney" Barnato, great speculator of the last century. Hammond experienced some romantic adventures including an acrimonious encounter with Paul Kruger, president of the Transvaal republic who sentenced him to be hanged and relented only on the intervention of the secretary of state.

After developing mining property in many parts of the world, Mr. Hammond was appointed by President Taft in 1911 as special ambassador and personal representative at the coronation of King George V.

AFTER settling a general strike in which 1,000,000 workers had paralyzed the industrial life of France, the new "popular front" government under Premier Leon Blum was faced with further difficulties in the form of a series of new strikes. Although the government had toiled day and night trying to adjust disputes and though most of the demands of strikers had been satisfied by employers, there was a smaller return to work than had been expected. It was reported that as fast as strikes in some industries were settled, others were affected.

The extent of the permanent ravages which will be left in the wake of this upheaval will only become apparent later on. Some observers predicted that private industry would be forced into bankruptcy so as to secure operation by the state. But whether Premier Blum and his "popular front" government were prepared for such extreme measures was not at all certain.

THE Supreme Court of Illinois upheld the constitutionality of the state's fair trade act in a decision affirming the opinion of the Cook County Circuit court. The court held that Carl W. McNeil, in the liquor business in Chicago, could not sell his product at less than the wholesale list price. Said the opinion:

"The fair trade act has for its major objective the preservation and protection of property interests of the producer and his distributors in the good will represented by brands, trade marks and trade names."

INDICATIVE of the rising tide of business recovery, the Western Electric company, a subsidiary of the American Telephone and Telegraph company, one of the largest employers of labor in the Middle West, resumed its common dividends. The action follower restoration of the company's operations to a profitable basis in 1935, with gains in both sales and employees. Practically the entire payment, amounting to $3,000,000, goes to American Telephone and Telegraph, which owns more than 90 per cent of Western Electric's stock.

At the company's Hawthorne works, near Chicago, 10,500 employees were on the payroll on June 1, an increase of 1,730 since January 1. This compares with a low of approximately 6,700 during 1933. Employment is now the highest since 1932.

A VITAL alteration in Great Britain's foreign policy, particularly as it affects Anglo-Italian relations, was indicated by Chancellor of the Exchequer Neville Chamberlain in an address in which he implied broadly that England may soon move to end sanctions against Italy. Regarded by many experts as likely to become Britain's next prime minister, Chamberlain said:

"Collective security based on sanctions has failed."

This was taken to mean that England may reverse the policy which had supported the League of Nation's futile sanctions campaign to halt Mussolini's conquest of Ethiopia.

In authoritative diplomatic circles in London it was reported that Mussolini had definitely served notice on Britain that Italy will leave the league unless the assembly meeting at Geneva on June 30 drops the anti-Italian sanctions program.

AGRICULTURE was given representation on the federal reserve board through the appointment by President Roosevelt of Chester C. Davis, administrator of the AAA to that body. In discussing his appointment, Mr. Davis said: "The fiscal policy of the federal government has never been tied in closely enough with agricultural problems." Mr. Davis has spent most of his life in agricultural activities. He was born on a farm in Iowa, was graduated from Grinnell college and later owned and operated a farm. For some years he was a newspaper publisher and then became editor of the Montana Farmer.

Doctor Tolley

Mr. Davis was succeeded as AAA administrator by Dr. Howard R. Tolley. Nationally known as a soil expert, Doctor Tolley helped Mr. Davis draft the soil conservation plan, enacted after the United States Supreme court decision invalidated the AAA.

THE New Deal was made the issue of a congressional campaign in Alabama with the result that Luther Patrick, an ardent supporter of the administration, defeated Congressman George Huddleston, an incumbent for 22 years. Patrick, a forty-two-year-old lawyer, won the Ninth district nomination by about 6,000 votes after a spirited campaign in which he charged Huddleston with disloyalty to the New Deal.

CALLED back to the British cabinet, which he left some months ago as a political scapegoat, Sir Samuel Hoare was made first lord of the admiralty, to succeed Viscount Monsell. Sir Samuel, who boldly faced a hostile house of commons last December to defend his part in the Anglo-French peace plan which would have given Mussolini only a part of Ethiopia, will face the task of solving problems arising out of British-Italian fleet difficulties in the Mediterranean. The biggest task facing Hoare, however, is restoration of the British navy to an undisputed position of supremacy on the seas.

TEXAS celebrated the one-hundredth anniversary of its independence by opening a $25,000,000 centennial exposition in Dallas. Foremost among distinguished visitors attending the world's fair the first week was President Roosevelt. To obtain the centennial exposition Dallas made available more than $9,000,000 in cash and property. The exposition will be open until November 29. Numerous other celebrations marking the state's 100 years of freedom have been held in various cities and towns of Texas. The exposition presents educational, historic and recreational features associated with a major world's fair.

THE senate passed the $829,000,000 compromise revenue measure by a vote of 38 to 24. The bill then went to conference with the house of representatives which had enacted a revenue measure carrying out tax proposals made by President Roosevelt. The senate measure called for a 15½ to 18 per cent tax on net corporate incomes as compared with the present 12½ to 15 per cent levy; a new type of 7 per cent tax on undistributed profits; repeal of the existing exemption of dividends from the 4 per cent normal income tax; an increase of 1 per cent in the individual income surtax on surtax brackets between $6,000 and $50,000.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

Washington.—The sudden passing of Speaker Joseph W. Byrns was a great shock to his colleagues, among whom he was universally loved and respected. Back of the speaker was a full quarter-century as a member of the house from the "Hermitage district" of Tennessee, a tenure which saw him go through a dozen successful political campaigns and which brought him chairmanship of the house appropriations committee, leadership of the Democratic majority and head of the Democratic congressional campaign committee.

"Uncle Joe" to his constituents, he was a shrewd politician, a masterful parliamentary strategist and a fair-minded chairman and presiding officer whose personal qualities won praise from political opponents.

He was a lawyer by profession, an avid reader of history, biography and detective stories and a fisherman whenever a letup in his work allowed him to indulge in that pastime. He liked to travel by airplane.

Close to 6 feet 2 inches tall, he was rangy and soft-voiced. Rugged features were accentuated by beetling, shaggy eyebrows.

Byrns' service on the pivotal appropriations committee began early in his congressional career, which started in March, 1909. In 1931 he became chairman, resigning the position when he was chosen party floor leader in 1933.

1929 Campaign Head

Byrns was made chairman of the national Democratic congressional campaign in 1929 and it was a matter of pride to him that it was under his leadership that his party regained control of the house.

He was born on a farm near Cedar Hill, in Robertson county, on Tennessee's northern border, July 20, 1869.

After being graduated from high school, Byrns entered Vanderbilt university, earning his tuition by working in the tobacco fields of Robertson county during vacations. He took an academic course for two years, then switched to the law school and was graduated with the degree of LL.B, in 1890. After one more summer of farm work he hung up his shingle in Nashville.

Politics opened a natural pathway to the acquaintanceship needed by a young lawyer and Byrns, four years after he began practice, was elected to the state legislature. He served three successive terms in the house from 1895 to 1900.

Byrns was a presidential elector in 1904 and in 1908 became a candidate for congress. He had to defeat a redoubtable campaigner, John Wesley Gaines, to win the nomination, but turned the trick, carried the November election and took his seat in the national house March 4, 1909.

Warning for Women

Country women who voted to concentrate their efforts for the next three years on native handicrafts were warned of certain marketing dangers.

Miss Bertha Nienburg, assistant director of the women's bureau, told the Associated Country Women that the Labor department believes the commercialized cottage industry a detriment to rural life.

New England women knitters had been exploited, she said, receiving as low as 25 cents a dozen for knitted booties, and a survey of the bed quilt makers of the southern mountains had shown an annual $3,000,000 sale of quilts that brought but a dollar a week wage to the workers.

She cited the Southern Highlands association, started about a year ago with a loan from the Tennessee Valley authority, as an example of a working co-operative, marketing the mountaineer handicrafts to the tourists at Norris, and to city dwellers at Rockefeller Center, N. Y.

Margaret A. Ambrose, state home demonstration agent of Tennessee, contended that commercial exploitation could be circumvented by simply turning down that sort of orders.

She too urged keeping the country woman's handicraft cultural, saying: "If you can make something beautiful for your home, so that other women who see it will want it for their homes, you will have no trouble marketing it."

Population Shifts

A New Deal planning bureau is busy at the moment trying to discover whether America's great cities are moving into the country. In recent years a definite trend in which people have been moving from thickly populated city areas to outlying suburbs has been noticed. The exact extent of the shifts is not known. The studies are being carried on in Washington, Cincinnati, Cambridge, Mass., and Ann Arbor, Mich.

Three of the chief points in the survey are:

1. The contrasting ways of life in cities and in country.
2. The influence of modernized transportation on city development.
3. Model communities, such as subsistence homesteads in the United States, garden cities in England, and combined rural-industrial communities in Holland, Germany, and France.

The survey will take in what city areas should be devoted to residential purposes and what to business and industrial purposes.

Labor Up in Arms

Organized labor seized the Supreme court's 5-to-4 denial of states' rights to fix minimum wages and hours for women and children as an added weapon in demands for a constitutional amendment, giving congress powers over industry.

Leaders of the American Federation of Labor, headed by William Green, saw the minority opinion as basis for their demands. The majority opinion was the fourth severe blow to labor from the court in a little more than a year.

The court knocked out the NRA, railway retirement act, the Guffey coal control act and recently the New York minimum wage law. All were strongly supported by organized labor.

The court in a split decision held the federal government in the Guffey law could not regulate working conditions of miners and in the New York case held states did not have the power either. Seventeen other states have similar laws. These, however, were not directly involved in the New York case.

The decision brought the controversy over the Supreme court to a new high point. Whether the fight for a constitutional amendment would be carried into the coming political campaign remained uncertain. President Roosevelt has given no direct indication he will raise the issue.

Uses Alien Clerks

Though the State department in its foreign service employs more foreign than American clerks—919 against 714—Americans fill the bulk of the better-paying clerkships. Of the 659 foreign service clerks drawing salaries of $1,000 a year or better only 28 are of foreign nationality.

The State department hires its foreign clerks at bargain prices. Some are willing to work for Uncle Sam for as little as $180 a year, but most of them are paid something better, receiving $500 to $800 annually.

No foreign clerks are now appointed to diplomatic missions. They will be found only in consular offices abroad. His knowledge of foreign languages and his local connections make the foreign clerk a valuable employee.

In addition to clerks the State department in its diplomatic missions and consulates employs 147 interpreters and translators (only 15 are Americans), about half of the translators and interpreters being paid less than $1,000 a year. The foreign service roster includes 15 Chinese writers, with salaries from $529 to $1,200.

Ship Inspection

A complete reorganization of the bureau of navigation and steamship inspection, which has been under fire for two years, was promised by Secretary of Commerce Daniel C. Roper.

The reorganization, it was learned, was fought by high officials in the Commerce department, because no political jobs were involved and with the appropriation increased for the inspection bureau congress might eventually cut down on other agencies within the department.

The reorganization was pushed through to successful legislative enactment several days ago by Joseph B. Weaver, director of the bureau, who declared that his staff was inadequate. Plans call for additional local and traveling inspectors.

Roper announced that the reorganization would make the bureau "more efficient." He was asked whether there would be any "free rides." This was a reference to the use of the yacht Eala, which had been chartered for steamboat inspection but was used for parties for Roper's family and joy rides by New Dealers.

The secretary did not comment. His face reddened and with a forced smile he concluded the interview.

Apparently the reorganization idea was uppermost in the Commerce secretary's mind, for he announced several changes in personnel in the department.

Plans "Garden Homes"

A new administration housing program involving development of "garden homes" outside of large cities, was outlined by Stewart McDonald, federal housing administrator.

Saying that President Roosevelt "is enthusiastic" over the plan, McDonald told newspaper men it was aimed at a gradual movement of industrial workers and similar classes from urban and suburban areas to small homes situated on one to two acre plots several miles from city limits.

Emphasizing that "this is not anything in the way of a benevolent proposition" and that no grants of federal funds were involved, he said it would be accomplished through a broadening of FHA regulations to permit government insurance of mortgages on such property.

This will enable bankers and other leaders to advance funds for the development of these "in between" areas for residential purposes, he said.

"The President believes that whenever possible people should be on an acre to two of ground with trees, gardens and shrubbery," he said.

"This plan has been made possible by inventions and improvements in the last ten years. Now we have good roads, electricity, water facilities, and other conveniences for those areas in between the city and the country. Such a program was not possible during the last building boom."

CHAPTER I

Jeb wrote his name, Judson E. Braddon, with a finishing flourish, on the last of the sheaf of checks before him; and he flung his fountain-pen accurately into its bell-lipped holder. He liked to hit it like that, after signing checks for four hundred thousand. And it was his money, or funds under his control. His name, written by himself, converted these green slips of paper into cash. Sometimes, sitting here, he had signed for more than half a million; once for a million. And he could sit back and spear that holder with his pen so that it stuck in, two out of three tries. That was showing your nerves were in shape; that was staying twenty-eight and beating business at the same time.

Miss Gilbert came in to gather up the checks.

"Who's waiting?" Jeb asked.

"Mr. Saunders about Insull Utilities; Mr. Hazen . . . And have you forgotten your brother, Mr. Braddon?"

Jeb laughed. "Good Lord, I did! Is he still out there? Shoot him in first."

Left alone, Jeb swung about slowly in the winter sunlight and gazed out his windows over the city. All Chicago, except a rival pinnacle or two, lay below him; for the offices of J. E. Braddon and Company claimed two floors high in one of the tallest towers. Roofs white with last night's new snow reached away, square after square.

Hidden under those roofs, and in the deep ruts of the streets between, were three millions of people. The conflict of their lives, in its innumerable forms, set beating this tense, eager impulse that you felt here in Chicago.

Crude and cultured; pagan and Puritanic; savage and overcivilized; incredibly cruel and extravagantly, absurdly maudlin in many of its mercies. A city, like all the nation, superspeeded for making money, it put millions into many hands that never before had fingered either wealth or privilege.

Judson Elliot Braddon's were far from the least familiar with these. He had much more behind him than most of these young men of destiny of 1929; and the place he won for himself in this city had surpassed theirs.

How important it was, his splendid impressive offices declared; and at the sound of the door, Jeb swung back, giving a glance around his big room. It had not ceased pleasantly to impress him. It never impressed his brother. No display of Jeb's swift success ever aroused Rodney. He did not envy or disdain it; he simply seemed not to be affected by it. Rod always had been that sort, utterly different. Jeb could not remember that Rod ever had expressed a desire to make money; neither as boy nor man. Some day, both boys had known, each of them would "come into" forty thousand dollars left in trust by their grandfather.

That day, when he was twenty-one, had come for Rodney eight years ago; and in the bank at Andover reposed the identical forty thousand dollars, in bonds of the city of Andover and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which eight years ago had been formally delivered to Rodney Braddon.

The day, for Judson, had arrived seven years ago; and the forty thousand in bonds had become four millions in stocks and equities; in fact, nearly five—if Jeb sold out at today's prices.

The door opened.

"Hello, Rod."

"Hello, Jud." "Jud" was the old familiar nickname when they were boys; but after he went to Yale, Jud had cast it off for the name made from his initials—J. E. B., like "Jeb" Stuart. Rodney had not gone to Yale; he was then at Johns Hopkins, going in for medicine and biology.

"Come in!" invited Jeb; and Rod closed the door behind him.

"Busy?" asked Rod, absolutely without offense.

"Didn't mean to be, old fellow," said Jeb as the lifetime of affection for this unpractical, unseeking brother, so different from himself, flowed over him. "Tell the truth, Rod, I just forgot."

"I just thought I'd look in to see you, since I'm leaving town," said Rodney.

"Leaving Chicago? For how long?"

"A full month, anyhow."

"Where you going?"

"Rochester—Minnesota, Jud, where the Mayos are. They're doing some work in immunity up there that I've got to see."

Actually Rod had been invited to take part in the work, but that was something he would never volunteer, not even to his brother.

"Then you're coming back here, Rod?"

"Probably not. Germany—Leipsic, I think, on the same trail."

"That'll take more than another month."

"Six—or a year, I guess, Jud, once I get in Europe."

"When you leaving?"

"I'm taking the train tonight."

"That means you're practically clearing out tonight—for a year."

"I guess so, Jud."

The two tall brothers gazed at each other in silence. In all their lives, they had never held a hope or a desire which brought them into conflict, until now.

"How much has Agnes Gleneith to do with this?" Jeb inquired.

"Agnes?" repeated Rod in his quiet way. "Agnes is not in it, Jeb."

"But you don't want to go alone. Do you?"

"No, Jud, I don't," answered Rodney honestly.

"Then why don't you make a try for her? For the first time in your life you want something for yourself—you do want her, like the very hell, don't you?"

"Yes," said Rodney. "I do. And you do, too. Don't you?"

"No," denied Jeb. "Not the way you do."

He did want Agnes; as a matter of fact, he was becoming sure he wanted her for his wife; but he was aware that he was capable of no such singleness and devotion as Rodney. For Jeb to live—really live—was to be in love, more or less excitingly, with some girl of the sort you might marry; and until you married, to have "affairs" with women whom you could not "harm," and whom you kept discreetly screened.

In Rod's life there had been nothing of that sort, never. There was a deeper, obstinate decency in Rod, and much sterner restraints. He offered to Agnes Gleneith an almost totally different outlook; and Jeb was realizing this with something like a pang of shame when he said:

"How do you know she'd not rather have you than me—or anybody else?"

"Do you think she might, Jud?"

Jeb jerked about. "They're funny fools, women, Rod," he said. "Sometimes they'd rather throw themselves away than—" He caught himself as he saw his brother's flush. "I don't mean that Agnes marrying you would be throwing herself away, except from your point of view. I'm trying to tell you, Rod, what they do. They won't care a damn about you when you're sure they should; and when they shouldn't, you've got 'em. And you won't know it; you'll be the last to know it, and you've had 'em all the while."

He moved abruptly to his desk and pressed his buzzer. The prompt appearance of Miss Gilbert forestalled any reply from Rodney.

"Get Miss Gleneith on the phone," Jeb said.

In the house twenty miles north along the lake shore, Agnes Gleneith had been informed that Mr. Braddon wished to speak to her.

"You tell her, Rod; or shall I?" Jeb extended the instrument.

"Tell her what?"

"That you're coming out to her on the first train. Quick! I can hear her near the phone. You're going to tell her—or I will!"

Rod, with a sudden violence that amazed Jud, snatched the telephone, and in a moment he was speaking to Agnes. . . .

Agnes was nearly twenty-three, and she would have said upon that winter afternoon, when snowflakes were beginning to blow from the north even before the clouds floated under the sun, that nothing in the least extraordinary had ever happened to her. She had been born in an attractive, pleasant house only half a mile away from this huge handsome country mansion, on the lake shore, which for the last eleven years—almost half of Agnes' life—had been home.

Beatrice, her sister who was two years older, also had been born in that same smaller house; for there her father had brought her mother as a bride. Such was the phrase by which her mother always described that house: "When I was a bride, Bob brought me here to that little house on Easter Lane—"

It was little only in comparison; it had a great garden, gay in summer with phlox, sweet William, larkspur and Canterbury bells. It had intimate, cheery fireplaces, and next the sunny rooms which had been Agnes' and Bee's, had been Papa's and Mamma's room wherein had been their big bed.

Agnes thought of that house as having been always happy; and she could remember when she was a child, and would run into Papa's and Mamma's room in the morning in her white flannel "teddy" with "feet," and Papa would pick her up and kiss her and then bounce her down between Mamma and him in the big bed.

Father must have been making plenty of money then. Of course he had much more now, very much more. Millions, Agnes realized; yet the money had not greatly altered the patterns of her dreams, which had been shaped to satisfaction in the little house; nor had it greatly changed the actual course she pursued. She had left Country Day school for a very expensive girls' school in Connecticut when she was fifteen; and that might not have happened from the little house; but soon she went on to Smith college, as always she had planned, and had been graduated last June. The summer abroad; and now she was at home, which meant, when she was in the house, that she was with her mother, mostly; and when she was out, she was with Bee, who had married four years ago and had two babies; or she was hurrying about, being busy with Junior league errands; and she was waiting for the man she was to marry.

Agnes did not pretend anything else with herself. To be happy, a girl must bind herself in utter intimacy with a man; she must be a wife: Agnes wanted to be a wife and have babies, like Bee's dear adorable little boys. But she did not want a husband like Bee's, though Bee argued she was happy. Agnes knew that when you were, you showed it—you didn't debate it.

DRAGONS DRIVE YOU

"There is just so much in the cup," he told her. "You can sip it all your life, afraid really to taste it—or you can dare to drink the whole thing down while you are living!"

Such was the challenge of Jeb Braddon, young, ambitious, fantastically successful broker, wooing Agnes Gleneith from his rivals by the impetuous force of his love. Such, too, was the spirit of the mad, seething city of Chicago, just before the Crash—a very maelstrom of madness in which cravings for money and power were like dragons, driving men to incalculable ambitions and follies. Against this stirring background is unfolded a gripping story of a young woman reaching for happiness, losing it in the confusing world about her, and at last finding it again.

One Big Shot Convicted

The kind of "justice" supposed to "terrify" crime in this country is very amusing justice: confined to the national government. Murderers, kidnapers and other racketeers are jailed, not for their crimes against society, but for failure to pay income tax. The felon is jailed for failure to divide his criminal earnings with his government.

Arthur Brisbane

A change from this program is due to Special Prosecutor Dewey, who, before Supreme Court Justice McCook, in New York city, has convicted a "topnotch racketeer," as Mr. Dewey calls him—Charles ("Lucky") Luciano. He and eight vice-ring associates are convicted on 62 counts, that may entail prison sentences of 1,240 years for "Lucky" and each associate.

This is an actual conviction for crime, not for taxdodging.

In this world, many laugh and a few do things. Fulton said he would run a boat up the Hudson river by steam; crowds gathered to laugh.

When it was suggested early in this century that men would soon fly, successfully, millions laughed.

Had it been suggested that an army officer would cross the continent "flying blind" in a hooded cabin, seeing nothing, guided by a scientific "radio beam," the laughs would have been louder; but that is what Major Baker, of the army air corps, has just done. If you should say now that giant ships will fly around this earth, up in the stratosphere, above clouds and storms, carrying thousands of passengers, dropping them at their various destinations in smaller ships, "around the world in 48 hours or less," there would be more laughter but it would be foolish laughter. What men can imagine they can do, and more.

General Badoglio, who was sent by Mussolini to take over Ethiopia, and did so, celebrated his triumph in Rome. Mussolini and the Italian king, now emperor of Ethiopia, assisting.

The triumphant general, named viceroy of Ethiopia by Mussolini, who surprised the world with the swiftness of his conquest, led his troops, burned by the tropical sun, under the victory arch of Constantine to the tomb of the unknown soldier of the big war.

"Storms kill nine in Oklahoma and Kansas; tornadoes, floods and lightning cause havoc," so runs the headline, and so other headlines have been running for months past. Hail ruins crops; lightning bolts kill three; "twisters," those powerful, revolving windstorms, lift up and knock down little houses.

The sultan of Sulu is dead on the Island of Jolo, now only sultan in name.

Once, as spiritual and temporal head, he ruled all the Mohammedans of the Sulu archipelago.

The death of this former ruler, Jamalul Kiram, recalls an interesting incident following the Spanish war. Jamalul, good Mohammedan, did not think he should deal with this nation, on account of its religion. He was soothed by an official statement that the United States had no official religion whatever.

The Black Legion, latest secret murder organization, tells candidates: "You cannot join unless you are a native-born, white, Protestant gentile; willing to proceed against negroes, Catholics and Jews." To "proceed against" means to murder.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, a Protestant organization, says it is shameful for the Black Legion to use the word "Protestant," and blasphemous to use the name "God Almighty."

Sir Samuel Hoare had to leave the British cabinet because he opposed the foolishness of sending a great British fleet into the Mediterranean to protect Haile Selassie, not protecting him in the least.

Now, Sir Samuel Hoare is back in the British cabinet, "the king pleased to appoint him." This means, probably, that the futile League of Nations' "sanctions" effort to coerce Mussolini will be dropped. Many things are easier than coercing Mussolini.

Why do Americans swallow eagerly anything in the way of foreign-made goods, especially if they come from the friendly British islands?

British merchants advertise proudly "Made in Great Britain." Every Englishman urges "Buy British." Americans seem proud if they can advertise "Made in England" or "Made in France." Perhaps our goods are inferior but every American makes his money here—why not back our own people?

More killing, bombing, shooting in Palestine, Arabs refusing to discontinue strikes and killings, even at the request of their own leaders.

The Republicans Militant And Ready For Battle

No wise Democrat will deceive himself by taking lightly the course of events at the recent Cleveland convention. The Republican party, which until recently was broken and demoralized, has reformed its ranks and today presents a semblance of unity and a battle spirit that bodes possible trouble.

The Republican party is infinitely stronger today than it was a week ago. It is not yet, in the opinion of The Advertiser, strong enough to win; it would not seem to be in the cards for the Republicans to win this year. This is an opinion widely shared by students of politics.

But it is in the cards for the Republicans to give the Democrats trouble. As matters stand the Democrats must consider the possibility of losing States which a week ago they confidently regarded as safely Democratic.

Today, Now York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio and California are any man's quarry. Four years ago Mr. Roosevelt carried all of them. Mr. Roosevelt has got to make the fight of his life to carry these powerful states this year. He has got to fight also in Indiana, Massachusetts, Colorado and Missouri.

A week ago the Republican party was what the sports writers called a pushover; today it is strong enough to make a good showing. capable even of sneaking over some surprise punches. Therefore the Democrats have their work cut out for them. Let them be on guard! Let them take no chances. James A. Farley, Daniel A. Roper and Rex Tugwell cannot win the war. Only Roosevelt, supported and counselled by such men as Glass, Robinson, Harrison, Wagner, Hull, Wallace and other thoughtful Democrats can win it.

How strong is the enemy? What is its background, its point of view? What does the enemy promise that is most likely to appeal to voters?

Governor Landon and Colonel Knox constitute a very good ticket. Both are intelligent, independent, robust men—both Westerners. The native flavor is strong in them. Perhaps it is not without signifcance that in 1912 both of them bolted Taft and supported Theodore Roosevelt's Bull Moose party, yet today they rule the Republican party. Since Senator Hiram Johnson of California was Theodore Roosevelt's running mate in 1912 it seems unlikely that he would forsake his comrades in 1936 and vote for the Democratic candidates, as he did in 1932.

Landon is close to the soil of the great West, where most voters are accustomed to adventure. Neither he nor Knox is a dismal reactionary of the McKinley school of politics. Because of their temperaments, their points of view and their background their nominations have naturally accentuated the Democratic problem in the Western States.

As to the attitude of the great East toward them, that is another question. Today the Republican party is entirely free of Eastern control, except for the weight that the East's campaign funds and votes may have in the counsels of the prairie prophets who are now in command.

Landon, who by the admission of his stoutest partisans, is not a "great" man, nevertheless is an adequate man. He is clear-headed and brave, if a little onery and narrow. He is clean, and he knows something about budgets and tax burdens. Such a Republican will bear watching by Democrats. He is a man of greater scope than Coolidge, but no match on the stump for Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The Republicans have adopted an entertaining and harmless platform. It is very well written, very carefully contrived. It does not mean a great deal, one way or the other. What counts is the interpretation that Landon will put upon the utterances of the "Senatorial soviet" that drafted the platform.

Naturally the Republicans will attack the Democratic administration all along the line. They will charge the Democrats with every offense from treason on down.

What the Repubicans say in their platform is partly sane, partly hokum. The sanity in it is comparable to the sanity of the Roosevelt administration, the hokum in it is just so much tripe. In due time the Democratic polemists will deal a deadly blow to the asseverations of the Republicans with reference to all doubtful questions.

Mr. Landon is no match for Mr. Roosevelt on the hustings But is is just as well that Democrats should realize now that they face a fight that they had not anticipated. The Republicans are not yet strong enough to lick the Democrats, but they are strong enough to give battle on all fronts. The Democrats in November will know they have been in a fight. Let us understand that now.

WRITER'S CONCLAVE

The Alabama Writer's Conclave is being held in Montevallo this week, and this distinguished organization has brought together in annual session several hundred outstanding writers and artists who are spending the week in a profitable exchange of ideas and successful creative accomplishments.

The highlights of opening night can only be briefly sketched for you—Promptly at 8 o'clock there assembled in Palmer Hall one of the most appreciative audiences we have ever seen. A spirit of good comradeship pervaded the atmosphere, and those who presented the program, and those who were "listeners", were drawn together by that invisible but tangibly strong bond of congenial craftsmanship. Dr. George Lang, President, from University of Alabama, introduced the artiss, and presented Dr. A. F. Harmon, who extended cordial greetings and a hearty welcome to the Alabama writers who will make the College their home during this week. The clever response of Esther Argo of Birmingham, captivated her colleagues and she received an ovation. Following a brief musical program, Dr. Lang in his own inimitably happy way presented his annual message and this literary gem will linger long in the hearts and minds of his hearers. A reception at the home of Dr. and Mrs. A. F. Harmon, closed the nights presentation.

There are many outstanding programs scheduled which will continue thru Friday night, after which, a brilliant banquet will bring the Conclave to a successful termination.

The most popular couple unanimously approved and beloved by the entire group, is Mr. and Mrs. Henry Drennen Agnew of LaFayette, whose joint interest and untiring efforts in behalf of this organization are held largely responsible for the success this interesting assembly has enjoyed. We personally have cause to express gratitude to this charming couple for a lovely social courtesy, generously extended on Tuesday night which we shall not soon forget. Well, "time's up"—and we must hasten along to local chatter: Let's take a peek thru the window and see what is happening on Main Street since we left it.

COLUMBIANA CHATTER

The Rev. D. Z. Wooley, who has served the Baptist Church for the past 6 years, has resigned to accept another field for his ministerial duties. His resignation will be effective on July 15th.

Willie Thomason, gifted Scout Columnist of Siluria, was happily greeted by his many friends in Columbiana on Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Allen of Ashland spent a few hours in Columbiana on Sunday, after attending the Allen Home Coming in Spring Creek. Frank Allen is a graduate of Shelby County High School, and Birmingham Southern College. He has success fully taught school for a number of years in Clay County, and this past week was honored by receiving the Democratic nomination for Clay County Superintendent of Education. Mr. Allen's many friends in Shelby County send congratulations across the miles, and all good wishes for continued success in his chosen educational field of endeavor.

The Democrat staff of writers and co-workers are delighted to announce that Buddy Leonard, after an absence of two months, during which time the serious illness of her husband, James Leonard, prevented this energetic and efficient worker from her journalistic and advertising activities, is "back on the job" and will be delighted to renew your subscription to the Democrat or to take your orders for Job Printing and Advertising.

Jack Cooper of Birmingham visited his parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Cooper in Columbiana on Sunday.

Miss Louise Ellis, rated as one of the most efficient Physical Education Directors in the State, has again accepted a position in Seatone N. C. to direct the recreational program for this popular Children's Camp. Miss Ellis spent last summer in the Carolinas, and has neeb recalled by the officials of this famous resort for another season.

George Richardson, formerly with the Democrat, was married to Mabel Peters of Deatsville, on Sunday. Jit Taylor and Charlie Verne Tinney of Columbiana attended the lovely nuptial ceremony which was celebrated at the home of the bride's sister. Mr. and Mrs. Richardson will make their future home in Tuscaloosa, where Mr. Richardson is employed by the Tuscaloosa News.

Do not forget Father's Day on next Sunday, June 21st.

Mr. and Mrs. Joe Davidson (Emmie Pitts) are receiving congratulations from their many friends upon the arrival of a little daughter on last Saturday morning at their home in Helena, Alabama. They have named the "blessed event" Marion Louise Davidson.

Miss Gibson of Troy, Alabama, who has been the feted guest of her sister, Mrs. Childs, was the inspiration for a lovely courtesy extended by the High School set on last Thursday night, when a Weiner and Marshmallow Roast was enjoyed at Lokey's Ferry. A dance at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Luther Fowler completed the night's entertainment.

Mrs. E. B. Cooper and Miss Avis Acker of Birmingham, are the guests of Mr. and Mrs. John Curlee in Columbiana.

Miss Mamie Jo Harbin of Athens, Alabama, was heartily welcomed in Columbiana on Sunday. Rarely, if ever, does a former resident receive such a cordial greeting as is accorded "Mamie Jo" when she returns to her former home, where she is so happily remembered by her many friends. Miss Harbin served this territory for a number of years in the capacity of County Health Nurse. She was a guest of Mrs. Grace Carter.

Mrs. L. B. Riddle, Bill Riddle and Mrs. Dixie Shealey were week end guests of Mr. and Mrs. Terrell Jackson (Wilma Riddle) in Gadsden.

Verna Kimball, former resident of little old Main Street, spent the week end in Columbiana, the guest of Miss Nina Fay Rinehart. Miss Kimball has many friends in town who were delighted to see her again. She is, at present, holding a responsible Secretarial position in the Federal Government offices located in Tuscaloosa.

Walter Chancellor, one of the owners of picturesque Chancellor's Ferry was a visitor in the Democrat offices on Wednesday. "Walter" is one of those little "promising Bonus Boys" whom we checked up on this morning Pretty good natured fellow and we are always delighted to join his many friends in welcoming him in Columbiana.

Cinema fans journeyed to the Strand Theatre in Montevallo on Sunday afternoon, to place their seal of approval on the opening of this popular play house for Sunday theatre goers. Mr. Watson offers three shows each Sunday, the first beginning at 2 P. M., the second at 3:45 and the last program begins at 8:45 P. M. each week.

Lemerle Penn, talented and versatile musician, was the distinguished guest of her Uncle, the Rev. H. M. Hurst. Miss Penn graciously sang for the large congregation at the Methodist Church on Sunday morning.

Mrs. Ronda Pitts and little daughter, Barbara Anne, of Birmingham, are the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Bruton Pitts in Columbiana.

The little "Bonus Boys" are happier today on account of the remuneration just received from Uncle Sam's emporium, with Charlie Niven as the jolly Santa Claus passing around the BONDS!

Some weeks ago, we received several "promises" regarding the millineum—the time for the arrival of these Baby Bonds and what we would get if, and when, they arrived, if we would do this and that—etc, etc., but so far we have not seen any material evidence of those "promises" being carried out. But, we have happily shared the air castles built with these anticipated American Eaglets—won on the battle field and we have enjoyed the ambitious goals some of the 'soldier boys" hoped to reach when the "Bonus" money arrived. For instance, there is a certain former doughboy who brought his Bonds into our office for us to see, who wished with all his heart he could place the bonds in a trust fund for a certain little young American's education. There were others who unselfishly thought of making MOTHER a present of one or two. Others who purchased a long wished for car for the family—and all in all, we think them an unselfish wonderful group of men who have proven their worth to their generation, and whom we personally think are entitled to do whatever they should like most to do with the BONUS—They truly earned this privilege and it has been bought and paid for by those who answered the clarion call in 1917! It makes you feel patriotic all over again just to look at the official documents they proudly carry today.

In not one single instance have we heard any one of these ex-service men express a selfish wish for personal gain from this monetary reward for patriotic duty so cheerfully rendered. They could not, however, be the men we KNOW them to be, if a selfish note had permeated the realization today. They are just—well, REAL MEN—that's what!

Eddie Watson, popular Manager of the Strand Theatre, was a visitor in Columbiana on Monday, and will offer Captain Blood, one of the outstanding pictures of the year for next Sunday's program presentation. Mr. Watson is highly pleased with the generous response accorded his innovation for Sunday movies in Shelby County, and will continue to present three shows each Suday—2 P. M., 3:45 P. M., and 8:45 P. M. He cordially invites you down Montevallo way next Sunday afternoon.

We are happy to acknowledge a subscription for 1936 to the Democrat from our good friend, Herbert Milstead, who formerly lived in Calera, but who now owns and manages one of the most modern Drug Stores in Coosa County. Mr. Milstead lives at Rockford, and we shall be delighted to journey down to this attractive place each week thru the columns of the "State's Most Distinctive Weekly."

Mr. and Mrs. Alvin Stinson have returned home after having spent several days in Southern Alabama and the Northern part of Florida with friends.

Lesson for June 21

JESUS EXALTED

LESSON TEXT—Luke 24:36-53.

GOLDEN TEXT—Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name.—Philippians 2:9.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Goes Home to Heaven.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Goes Home to Heaven.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Lord We Worship.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Exalted Christ and the Unfinished Task.

In order properly to view the ascension of Christ into heaven, it would be well to study his ministry during the forty days prior to his ascension.

I. The Walk of the Two Discouraged Disciples (vv. 13-15).

Emmaus was seven and a half miles northwest of Jerusalem. Just why these disciples were walking this way we do not surely know. Perhaps their home was there. Or they were merely walking to seek relief from their stunning sorrow. If they had believed what Jesus had told them about his death and resurrection, they would have escaped this great disappointment. Unbelief causes many heartaches and disappointments. The topic of conversation was the tragedy of the cross and the resurrection rumors. So little had his teaching about the resurrection impressed the disciples that the reports which the women brought were as idle tales to them.

II. The Unrecognized Companion (vv. 16-24).

1. Who he was (v. 15). While they reasoned together on the wonderful events of the last few days, Jesus joined them. When he questioned them concerning their sadness they did not recognize him. How often we are so engrossed with our sorrows and disappointments that we fail to recognize Jesus, even though he is walking by our side.

2. His question (v. 17). Perceiving their sadness and perplexities, he sought to help by calling forth a statement of their grief.

3. Their answer (v. 18). His questions so surprised them that they jumped to the conclusion that he was a stranger in Jerusalem. The condemnation and crucifixion of the great prophet of Nazareth were so recent and notorious that no one who had lived in Jerusalem could be ignorant of them.

III. The Scriptures Opened (vv. 25-31).

1. His rebuke (vv. 25-30). He did not rebuke them for not believing the strange stories that they had heard, but for ignorance of and lack of confidence in the Old Testament Scriptures. They had only accepted such parts of the Old Testament as suited their notions. The very center and heart of the Old Testament Scriptures set forth the death and resurrection of Christ. Ignorance of the Scriptures and unbelief as to the wonders and complete redemption wrought by Christ robs us of many joys and deprives us of power as workers for Christ.

2. Jesus Recognized (vv. 31-35). While sitting at meat with the disciples, their eyes were opened as they saw him bless the bread and distribute it to them. We too can see the Lord on such common occasions as eating a meal if we have open eyes. Indeed, we ought to see him when eating, buying, selling, and in our recreations, for he has promised his abiding presence. They were so filled with joy over this revelation of the Savior that they hastened back to Jerusalem to tell the other disciples of his resurrection.

IV. Jesus Stands in the Midst of the Eleven (vv. 36-47).

1. He said, "Peace be unto you" (vv. 36, 37).

However, they were terrified and affrighted. Sinful man in the presence of a holy God is ill at ease.

2. He showed them his hands and his feet (vv. 38-40). In order to convince them of his personal identity, he gave them tangible evidence that he was not a mere spirit.

3. He ate before them (vv. 41-45).

4. He commissioned them to evangelize the world (vv. 46-49). They were to testify concerning his shed blood and resurrection, and on this ground they were to preach repentance and remission of sins to all nations.

5. Jesus ascends into heaven (vv. 50-53).

Having given them the parting message to evangelize the world he ascended into heaven. From his place in heaven he continues to carry on his work through his disciples as they are energized by the Holy Ghost. Just as we treasure the last words of our departed loved ones so we should ponder this farewell message of our Lord.

Magnet of Thankfulness

The unthankful heart, like my finger in the sand, discovers no mercies; but let the thankful heart sweep through the day, and as the magnet finds the iron, so will it find in every hour some heavenly blessings, only the iron in God's sand is gold.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Earth holds heaven in the bud; our perfection there has to be developed out of our imperfection here.—C. Rossetti.

ALF M. LANDON COL. FRANK KNOX

Landon and Knox Nominated by Republican Convention

All Rivals Withdraw From Race—Platform Strengthened by Kansan's Interpretation—Great Ovation Is Tendered to Herbert Hoover.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

For President — Alfred Mossman Landon.
For Vice President—Frank Knox.

Convention Hall, Cleveland, Ohio.—Alf M. Landon of Kansas, forty-eight-year-old governor of that "typical prairie state" as Postmaster General Farley termed it, is the standard bearer of the Republican party, unanimously nominated by the convention, virtually by acclamation.

"Oh, Susannah" becomes the party song and "Three Long Years" its chant, and sunflowers are blossoming all over the land.

Landon's several rivals for the high honor all withdrew from the race before the call for nominations, and all votes pledged for others than the Kansan were released.

Second place on the ticket went to Col. Frank Knox, publisher of the Chicago Daily News. This, too, was a unanimous choice, made after three others who had been put in nomination withdrew and urged the selection of Knox.

Landon's victory signalized the supremacy in the convention of the younger element in the party—men and women not necessarily young in years but those who are young in professional politics. The members of the Old Guard, mostly conservative to a degree, were either absent from the roll of delegates or were so far in the minority that they were compelled to let the more liberal element do as it pleased. It was an unbossed convention and the decision as to the candidates was not reached in any "smoke-filled hotel room."

What the Platform Promises.

"America is in peril" are the opening words of the preamble to the platform on which Landon and his running mate stand, and they are followed by the reasons for the statement found in the doings of the Roosevelt administration. The most vital planks were those dealing with farm problems, the tariff, foreign relations and especially money, and it required a lot of discussion and tinkering to put these in shape. Summarized, they are:

Agriculture: We propose to facilitate economical production and increase consumption on a basis of abundance instead of scarcity . . . A national land-use program . . . protection and restoration of the land resources . . . payment of reasonable benefits upon the domestically consumed portion of such crops (with exportable surpluses) . . . government assistance in disposing of surpluses.

Tariff: We will repeal the present reciprocal trade agreement law. We will restore the principle of the flexible tariff. We will adjust tariffs with a view to promoting international trade, the stabilization of currencies, and the attainment of a proper balance between agriculture and industry.

Foreign affairs: We pledge that America shall not become a member of the League of Nations or of the World Court nor shall America take on any entangling alliances in foreign affairs. We shall promote the great cause of international arbitration through the establishment of free, independent tribunals.

Money: We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards . . . We oppose further devaluation of the dollar . . . We will restore to the congress the authority lodged therein by the Constitution to coin money and regulate the value thereof by repealing all the laws delegating this authority to the Executive.

Strengthened by Landon.

If the truth be told, the platform was not the strong, forthright declaration of principles and intentions that a vast number of Republicans had hoped it would be. The resolutions committee, dominated by the Landon men, thought it necessary to make many compromises, and in especial they sought by every means to gain the approval of Senator Borah. Indeed, his suggestions for the planks concerning foreign affairs, monopolies, money and labor were incorporated in the platform. But, before putting Landon in nomination, his manager, John Hamilton, read to the convention a telegram from the governor that really put teeth in the platform.

The governor said that the resolutions had been communicated to him, and that if nominated he would accept them unqualifiedly. But he thought it only honest to give his interpretation of certain planks. He continued:

"Under the title of labor, the platform commits the Republican party as follows:

"'Support the adoption of state laws and interstate compacts to abolish sweatshops and child labor, and to protect women and children with respect to maximum hours, minimum wages, and working conditions. We believe that this can be done within the Constitution as it now stands.'

"I hope the opinion of the convention is correct that the aims which you have in mind may be attained within the Constitution as it now stands. But, if that opinion should prove to be erroneous, I want you to know that, if nominated and elected, I shall favor a constitutional amendment permitting the states to adopt such legislation as may be necessary adequately to protect women and children in the matter of maximum hours, minimum wages and working conditions. This obligation we cannot escape.

Landon's Gold Policy.

"The convention advocates: 'A sound currency to be preserved at all hazards.'

"I agree that 'The first requisite to a sound and stable currency is a balanced budget.' The second requisite, as I view it, is a currency expressed in terms of gold and convertible into gold. I recognize, however, that the second requisite must not be made effective until and unless it can be done without penalizing our domestic economy and without injury to our producers of agricultural products and other raw materials.

"The convention pledges the party to the merit system and to its restoration, improvement, and extension. In carrying out this pledge, I believe that there should be included within the merit system every position in the administrative service below the rank of assistant secretaries of major departments and agencies, and that this inclusion should cover the entire Post Office department."

Though Senator Borah, leaving Cleveland just before the nominations, said the platform in general met with his approval, Landon's enlargement of the labor and money planks certainly was not what the Idahoan had favored.

Ovations for Herbert Hoover.

If anyone thought former President Hoover had become something of a nonentity in the Republican party's councils and in the esteem of the rank and file of Republicans, the reception given that distinguished guest of the convention must have disabused him of the idea. Mr. Hoover, on his arrival Wednesday, was greeted by an immense and enthusiastic throng, and throughout the day, though closeted in his room, he was consulted by many party leaders. The session that evening was given over almost wholly to listening to his address, and it was well worth hearing. During half an hour of tumultuous demonstration he was forced to stand bowing and smiling before he could utter a word; and when he did begin to talk he was followed with deep interest and his many telling phrases were cheered to the echo. He was serious throughout, and seriously called on his fellow Americans to pledge themselves to a crusade for human freedom.

Diary of the Convention.

Assembling Tuesday noon in the great Public Auditorium where Calvin Coolidge was nominated for the Presidency twelve years ago, the convention was welcomed by Mayor Harold H. Burton of Cleveland and proceeded to do a lot of routine business, necessary but uninteresting, with National Chairman Henry P. Fletcher presiding. This included the selection of Senator Frederick C. Stelwer, as temporary chairman. The evening session, enlivened at its start by some fine singing by Mr. Werrenrath, was notable for the keynote speech. The Oregon senator had been given the job of delivering a lot of hard hits at the Democratic administration, and he lived up to expectations. There was not, perhaps, a lot of statesmanship in his speech, but it was full of pungent phrases. Read a few of them:

"The New Deal depends on bookworms for practical experience and on hookworms for energy."

"New Deal extravagance is bending the backs of the people with an unfair burden and has condemned all the babies of the entire nation to be rocked in cradles decorated by debt."

"Fixing of prices by monopolies and combines picks the pocket of the buying public."

"There are no party lines when human liberty is at stake."

"For three long years we have had a government without political morality."

The senator reiterated with great effect that "three long years" until the convention and the galleries roared it in unison and the quick-witted band leader had the brasses playing it in three notes. By the next day the catch phrase had been made into a Republican song to the tune of "Three Blind Mice."

Rules Committee Plan Upset.

During the Wednesday morning session, devoted to business, the convention demonstrated its independence by upsetting the plan of the rules committee to increase the representation of Alaska, Hawaii and the District of Columbia from three to six votes each. A minority report against this was adopted.

Next came the induction of Bertrand Snell of New York as permanent chairman. This veteran of many conventions spoke at length, and his denunciation of the New Deal was a better job than was Senator Steiwer's. He termed the Republican campaign a new crusade—a crusade to restore to the American people their Constitution and their liberties, and in prophetic mood, he said:

"When the victory is won we shall give America a government high above the plane of party politics. We shall need in executive positions the services of constitutional Democrats and Republicans alike."

The second evening session was the Hoover session, told of above. It might be well to add the incident of Queenie Ethel Clair of New York. That personable blonde lady, grabbing a flag, led a prolonged demonstration after Mr. Hoover had left the platform and the hall, screaming "Hoover for President." She enlisted the aid of a good many delegates and gallery spectators, but the uproar, besides being a tribute to the high esteem in which the former President is held, was kept up mainly because the crowd wanted to let off steam.

Thursday the Big Day.

Because the platform committee was still struggling with its task, the convention met Thursday morning and again in the afternoon only to recess. For the third time it was called to order at eight in the evening, and the platform was read, rather perfunctorily cheered in spots, and adopted without contest.

Then Chairman Snell hushed the hall and uttered the long waited order for a roll call for nominations for President. Alabama passed. Arizona yielded to Kansas, and a yell arose as the chairman recognized John Hamilton. That alert and handsome gentleman strode up the platform, his chin decorated with a big plaster. He hadn't been biffed—it was just the result of a slipping razor. When quiet could be restored, Mr. Hamilton plunged into his speech with vigor and evident enjoyment. Loud cheers came for almost every phrase as he described the man whom he was to put in nomination, and when he named Landon the pent up excitement and enthusiasm broke all bounds. Bands blared, flags were waved wildly and the delegates followed their state standards in procession about the hall.

Half a dozen delegates, several of them women, seconded the nomination of Landon, and then those who had been his chief rivals for the honor came forward one after another and eloquently and heartily indorsed the evident choice of the convention, pledging their full support for his election. These gentlemen were Senator Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan, Col. Frank Knox of Illinois, Senator Lester J. Dickinson of Iowa, Gov. Harry Nice of Maryland and Robert A. Taft of Ohio.

Balloting for the nominee was a necessary formality. The result was: For Landon, 984; for Borah, 19. Eighteen of the Borah votes came from Wisconsin, which delegation immediately moved that the nomination be made unanimous. The other Borah vote was that of Carl Bachmann of West Virginia, who had been manager of the Borah campaign.

Knox for Vice President.

Selection of a Vice Presidential candidate at the closing session presented some difficulties. The Landon people wanted Vandenberg, but the Michigan senator refused repeatedly and firmly. Colonel Knox, Governor Nice, Walter Edge of New Jersey and Col. Arthur Little of New York were put in nomination, and it soon became evident the choice of the convention would be Knox as state after state seconded his nomination. Edge, Nice and Little withdrew their names, and the Chicago publisher became the unanimous choice for the second place on the ticket.

Cleveland and the local committee deserve a word of praise for the way in which the convention and the crowds it attracted were cared for

Football Apparently Much Older Than We Suspected

A sports writer has discovered that the Chinese are rapidly mastering Association football. He's a bit late, really. GUM-DIPPED TIRES WIN INDIANAPOLIS 500 MILE RACE

On May 30th, Louis Meyer broke the track record, at 109 miles per hour, driving the entire race without tire trouble of any kind. He is the only driver ever to win the race three times, and has always used Firestone Tires. No tires except Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires could have resisted the terrific heat generated at such high sustained speeds. You can have no greater proof of blowout protection.

Not one of the thirty-three drivers would risk his life on any other tire, for each driver knows that heat is the chief cause of tire failure and blowouts. Firestone cords are soaked in liquid rubber, which saturates and coats every cotton fiber, preventing friction and heat and adding great strength. This is the Firestone patented process of Gum-Dipping, that gives you greatest blowout protection and safety.

Profit by the experience of famous drivers. See your nearest Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store or Firestone Dealer, and have your car equipped today with Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires.

Small Cotton Farmers May Increase Diversion

AUBURN—Secretary Wallace has approved changes in the Agricultural Conservation Program to allow small producers and others to be paid for additional cotton base acreage planted to soil conserving crops or devoted to soil building practices.

Heretofore, the maximum diversion for which full payment could be paid was 35 per cent of an individual producer's base cotton acreage. The change allows small producers with a base of five acres or less to receive full payment for diverting up to two acres.

The provision that payments for a county as a whole could not exceed 25 per cent of the county quota was changed to allow individaul producers to be paid for diverting the full 35 per cent. Under this ruling any producer may receive full payment for diverting 35 per cent even if diversion for the county exceeds the previous 25 per cent maximum by a figure ranging up to 10 per cent.

The modifications enable small producers and other cotton farmers who have been hit by the drouth to take full advantage of the crop insurance provision of the Agricultural Conservation Program.

Early Molting Hens Expensive, Says Ivey

Hens which begin to drop their feathers in June and July are not worth keeping in good poultry flocks, advises John E. Ivey, extension poultry man, who states that these birds should be removed in order to save feed and expense.

Early—molting hens do not lay as many eggs as late molters and the eggs they do lay are produced at a time when eggs are plentiful and prices are low.

Farm Conditions Greatly Improved

The index price for farm products has more than doubled since February, 1933—an all time low Gross farm income has increased nearly $3,000,000,000 since 1932 The farm real estate market has been increasingly active, with advancing prices, over the past three years, until now the national average value of farms is 82 per cent of what it was in the immediate pre-war years, 1912-14.

ALABAMA SCHOOLS ONLY TO CLOSE SHORT OF TERM WITH EXCEPTION OF TWO

MONTGOMERY—With the exception of one of two schools in Kansas, Alabama schools are apparently the only ones in the atin closig short of a normal term this year. This information was given Mrs James Fitts Hill, president of the Alabama Congress of Parents and Teachers, in a letter today from Howard A. Dawson director of rural service for the National Education Association.

At the National Congress of Parents and Teachers held May 11 to 15 in Milwaukee, Mrs. Hill was the only president reporting the wholesale closing of schools. To find whether or not this was a true indication of conditions, the national office was asked for further information. Mr. Dawson's report shows Alabama to be the only state suffering wholesale closing.

Fifty-one counties in Alabama closed their schools this year short of a normal term with the average length being five and three-fourths months for elementary schools and seven and three-fourths for high schools. The normal term in Kansas in nine months.

Mr. Dawson's report is as follows: "I can not say positively that Alabama is th eonly state having schools close short of a normal term because a complete study has not been made. However, with the exception of one or two schools in Kansas, Alabama schools are the only ones I have heard of closing. Undoubtedly Alabama has suffered far more in this respect than any other state."

Mrs. Elizabeth Bowdon, Mrs. Cecil Cowart and Mrs. Leon Busby will be in charge for the first week.

Do you know that Alabama has not collected enough revenue to run the schools without federal aid since 1930-31?

The parking problem is getting to be a real concern to the younger generation.

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

* * *

Judging from reports already received, the County-Wide Scout Rally should go over in a big way. In this weeks Wilton Troop notes you will find that we have quite a number of names of boys who have promised to cooperate in every possible way to see that the Rally is a success

Nathen Maudling, John A. Kent and Troy Henderson Jr. of Siluria and Ed Dennis of Pelham have also pledged to help out in the Rally by having as many boys as possible from their town present.

There are three more places I would like to see join in and help us out so that we might make this one Rally that will never be forgotten by the Scouts of Shelby County. Namely these places are Columbiana, Montevallo and Maylene. How about it fellows, can't we load part of the responsibility on our shoulders?

The Column takes the pleasure here of expressing its appreciation for the fine spirit and prompt attention the Wilton Troop has shown in connection with the Rally. I believe these boys are enthusiastic a great deal over the idea. As soon as we get a few more boys to pledge themselves to cooperate with us we will go ahead with the plans.

It might not be a bad idea for you

Heart Drifts

NEVER WILL YOU HOLD ME

Never will you hold me
With puddings and cake,
Or even the threat
Of a heart to break.

Never will you hold me
With knife, fork and spoon
As long as the road lies
Under the moon.

Nor phantoms at fireside
With grief in the room,
Nor obvious candles
To jewel the gloom.

But a song stayr-footed
A moon of gowns of gold,
And laughter like a wine-cup—
These things hold.

A song within a song
And eyes upon the door—
And you will always hold me
One day more.

—Charles Divine.

SONG

Because I love, I weep,
Because I grieve, I sing;
Of all things, only sleep
Is a desired thing.

Denied or given, deep
Love thrusts its poisoned sting.
Of all things, only sleep
Is a desired thing.

M. C. D.

CHOICE

I set on this barren board
(Yours is the choice, not mine,)
The bread and leeks for your hungers ease,
The unacknowledged wine.

No protests—no demands—
Always there shall be
The driftwood fire that warms your hands,
The stars you will not see.

—Muna Lee.

HOME LOAN

Do you think one could get a short time loan
To repair life's old house of crumbly stone
In a garden walled high with memories
Where Autumn has painted the thinning trees?
It has lost the quick grace of other days,
But the windows are bright, and warm sun-rays
Filter through casements, cast shadows thin,
Of the light without and the light within.
I could ease the rattle in rafter joints,
I could prop up the walls at various points,
Do you think of a place where one could borrow
For a limited time surcease from sorrow,
Make slight repairs as a gesture to fate
Till the tenant be called to abdicate?

—A. S. T.

DEDICATION

I give you my thoughts in a thousand ways
From the dawn break through to the fading night,
Each swift joy caught from the lovely days,
Each hope that beats with the wings of flight
Further than sight . . . .
I give my prayers with their words unspoken,
And my memories that a life has spilled
Through days that stretch like a chain unbroken,
With the wisdom gained and the work fulfilled.
Could one give more, than I give it, knowing
No price too high for a gift so free,
And yet I think there would still be owing
Those many things I should like to be
So here is my soul. Yours for the taking,
The only gift that is worth the giving;
With all the dreams that one dreams through waking,
And all the deaths that one dies, through living.

Revised Guffey Coal Bill Is Passed—Republicans Map Campaign Strategy—England Abandons Anti-Italian Trade Sanctions.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

LAST minute passage of important legislation marked the closing sessions of congress before adjournment for the summer.

The house, by a vote of 161 to 90, passed the revised version of the Guffey bill to restore federal control of soft coal production, invalidated by the Supreme court. It passed the measure on to the senate.

Observers pointed out that this was the quickest repair job on a Supreme court decision that the New Deal has thus far achieved. The new bill eliminates provisions governing working hours and wages which the court held invalid.

It retains, however, two features which the court neither approved nor disapproved: 1—The granting to a national bituminous coal commission authority to fix prices and approve marketing agreements. 2—The imposition of a tax on the production of coal. The tax feature has been altered somewhat from the original bill. Instead of a flat 15 per cent tax on coal production, it calls for an outright excise levy of 1½ per cent on all soft coal, plus a 13½ per cent tax on coal in interstate commerce.

The house, likewise, adopted the two billion, 360 million dollar relief and deficiency bill. At the same time, it killed two other measures. One was for the appropriation of funds to complete the $150,000,000 Florida ship canal, which had been approved by the senate. The other was the anti-lobby bill sponsored by Senator Black of Alabama. As presented to the house it would have forced the registration of lobbyists, including those appearing before congress and before government departments. It would also have required information on contributions for lobbying purposes and payments made to lobbyists.

The senate by a vote of 42 to 24 passed the Wagner bill providing for a $460,000,000 program to encourage low cost housing construction. The bill would set up a federal housing authority to administer the act.

DEATH "in the harness" came to Senator Duncan U. Fletcher, dean of the senate, who had represented Florida in the upper house for the last quarter of a century. He died suddenly at his home in Washington. Senator Fletcher, a strong supporter of the Roosevelt administration although he was considered a conservative, was chairman of the banking and currency committee which bore the brunt of the task involved in the currency reform legislation and the banking act of 1935.

Sen. Fletcher

President Roosevelt, in a statement eulogizing the senator, said "the country has lost an able and conscientious servant in the death of Senator Fletcher." He declared the Floridian "was ever actuated by motives of high patriotism and unselfish devotion to the public welfare."

The death of Senator Fletcher followed closely the passing of Senator Park Trammel of Florida and the death of Speaker Joseph W. Byrns of Tennessee.

Senator Fletcher was born in Sumter county, Georgia, January 6, 1859. He was graduated from Vanderbilt university in 1880 and began the practice of law in Jacksonville, Fla., in 1881. He was elected to the United States senate in 1908 and had been renominated and re-elected in each subsequent term.

While no movement had been undertaken to select his successor as chairman of the important banking and currency committee, it was felt in Washington circles that Senator Carter Glass, senate veteran, Virginia Democrat, wartime secretary of the treasury and staunch gold standard advocate, was in line for the post. Although a critic of some of President's policies, Senator Glass has never gone far off the reservation.

A SEMI-ANNUAL checkup revealed that 10 debtor nations had notified the State department that they would default on their indebtedness to the United States. Included among these nations are: Great Britain, France, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Esthonia, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Poland.

Finland alone promised to pay. Belgium and Hungary had not yet replied to the State department's notice that an installment on their war debt was due.

While the present debt payment was being passed, in informed circles it is regarded that some basis of settlement will be sought by the European debtor nations in the near future. Increasing possibility of war in Europe, it is believed, will induce these nations to repair their credit situation in the United States.

SIX red-robed judges of Canada's Supreme court declared two of the Dominion's eight "social reform" laws unconstitutional, decided that two others were valid, one partly valid and returned tie verdicts on the other three.

The two major laws declared unconstitutional were the National Products Marketing Act, similar in some respects to the nullified American NRA and the Employment and Social Insurance Act, proposing a compulsory contributory employment insurance system. The laws were passed in 1934 and 1935 under the Conservative government then headed by Premier Bennett.

Declared valid were the Unfair Business Practices Act and the Farmers and Creditors Arrangement Act. The judges decided that the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act was partly valid. They reached a tie verdict on the Minimum Wages Act, the Limitations of Hours of Work Act and the Weekly Day of Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act.

IN TOPEKA, Kan., Gov. Alfred M. Landon, Republican nominee for the Presidency, met Col. Frank Knox, Vice Presidential nominee, and Chairman John Hamilton and members of the executive committee of the Republican national committee to make plans for the coming campaign. Speaking itineraries for Governor Landon and Colonel Knox were discussed as well as other campaign strategy.

John Hamilton

Youth is definitely represented in the reorganized personnel of the executive committee which will chart the Republican course. Hamilton, the new chairman, is forty-four. The youngest member, Robert P. Burroughs of Manchester, N. H., is thirty-six. Seven new members attended the meeting, including Burroughs; Representative Joseph W. Martin, Jr., North Attleboro, Mass.; J. Will. Taylor, Knoxville, Tenn.; Mrs. Horace Sayre, Ardmore, Okla.; Mrs. John Wyeth, St. Joseph, Mo.; Ezra Whitla, Coeur d'Alene, Idaho; and Earl Warren, Oakland, Calif. Members returned to the committee are: Charles D. Hilles, New York; Harrison E. Spangler, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; R. B. Creager, Brownsville, Texas; Mrs. Bertha Baur, Chicago, Ill.; Mrs. Paul Fitzsimmons, Newport, R. I.; Walter S. Hallahan, Charleston, W. Va.; and George Ball, Muncie, Ind.

In the reorganization of the committee, Hamilton traded posts with Henry P. Fletcher, who took over the job of counsel for the committee. C. B. Goodspeed of Chicago succeeded George F. Getz as treasurer. The other committee officers include four vice chairmen: Ralph E. Williams, Oregon; J. Henry Roraback, Connecticut; Mrs. John E. Hillman, Colorado; and Mrs. James Worthington, Pennsylvania.

DANGERS of civil war in China and an armed intervention by Japan were lessened somewhat by reports that Gen. Li Tsung-jen, military overlord of Kwangsi province, and his supporters had decided to yield to the superior strength of the Nanking central government, of which Chiang Kai-shek is the generalissimo. The rebellious chieftains of Kwangsi had been coupling their agitations against General Chiang with warlike demonstrations against the Japanese. Tokyo has demanded in no uncertain terms that the anti-Japanese activities throughout China be suppressed.

DEFINITE abandonment of Britain's trade sanctions against Italy and advocacy of their official removal by the League of Nations was decided upon by the British cabinet, under the presidency of Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin. This action of the cabinet had been expected for some time, following the failure of the sanctions to halt Italy's progress in the conquest of Ethiopia.

Anthony Eden

It was expected that Capt. Anthony Eden, foreign secretary, would go to Geneva to attend the league meeting and urge abolition of league sanctions against Italy. Dispatches from Paris indicated French support of the British program.

The cabinet was also reported to have formulated a program regarding Germany and the reformation of the league which may call for continued pressure on Reichsfuehrer Hitler to use his power and influence to promote European peace.

GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING is not optimistic concerning world peace. Addressing the graduating class at the United States Military academy on the fiftieth anniversary of his own graduation, the general said "no one can tell when we shall again need our armies." He continued: "The situation in the world today is far from reassuring. None can foresee the effect upon us of another world catastrophe. Loyal citizens cannot shut their eyes to the possibility of war. They owe it to all that is sacred to make ample preparation against an evil day."

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT returned to Washington from his tour through six western states and, though he was rather tired, he hoped to run up to New London, Conn., for the Yale-Harvard boat race. That depended on the congressional situation. He had to deal with the lawmakers who were all tangled up in the controversy over the tax bill, and also to complete his speech of acceptance to be delivered at Philadelphia on June 27.

President Roosevelt

The final speech of Mr. Roosevelt's trip was delivered at Vincennes, Ind., where he dedicated the handsome memorial to George Rogers Clark. He paid eloquent tribute to that conqueror of the Northwest, and found occasion to appeal for support of his own program. Said he:

"In his (Clark's) day among the pioneers there were jumpers of land claims and those who sought to swindle their neighbors though they were poor in this world's goods and lived in sparsely settled communities. Today among our teeming millions there still are those who by dishonorable means seek to obtain the possessions of their unwary neighbors.

"Our modern civilization must constantly protect itself against moral defectives whose objectives are the same but whose methods are more subtle than their prototypes of a century and a half ago. We do not change our form of free government when we arm ourselves with new weapons against new devices of crime and cupidity."

In a series of rhetorical questions the President defended the AAA subsidies to farmers, soil conservation, reforestation, and preservation of wild life.

From Vincennes Mr. Roosevelt went to Hodgenville, Ky., for a brief visit to Lincoln's birthplace, and then his train carried him back to Washington.

IN A secret consistory Pope Pius XI raised to the rank of cardinal two of his old friends, Giovanni Mercati and Eugenio Tisserant. Twenty-seven cardinals were present at the ceremony, among them being Cardinal Dougherty of Philadelphia.

During the consistory the pope formally proclaimed appointments of three American and two Canadian bishops. They were Msgr. George L. Leech, bishop of Harrisburg, Pa.; Msgr. Hugh L. Lamb, auxiliary bishop to Cardinal Dougherty, Msgr. William Adrian, Nashville, Tenn.; Msgr. Francis Carrol, Calgary, Alta, and Msgr. Patrick Bray, St. John.

JUST as his office was about to expire, Joseph B. Eastman, federal coordinator of transportation, submitted a report in which he proposed a lot of reforms by which the railroads might win back the business they have lost to the truck and the automobile. Among his suggestions are lower fares, lighter weight, and speedier cars, use of busses and trucks by the railroads to meet competition and consolidation of terminals and other facilities.

J. B. Eastman

He also advised the development of a nation-wide "container" service in the movement of freight by railway, highway and water, predicting that this would save millions of dollars in the handling of present freight and would create much new business. The containers are now used in a limited manner in some localities and industries.

Eastman recommended a "searching examination and thorough overhauling" of railroad pullman service, and a plan of operation under which the Pullman company would own and operate the cars and railroads, leasing them and retaining the entire revenue from the sleeping and parlor car service.

FOUR years ago Senator George Norris of Nebraska, independent Republican, warmly supported Franklin D. Roosevelt for the Presidency, and he now announces that he will again back the Democratic ticket. He urges his countrymen "to forget partisanship and come to the support of the man who more than any other man in recent years has stood for the welfare of the common people."

The senator said the Cleveland convention "nominated a man for President whose greatest asset is that nobody knows him and nobody knows what he stands for. It does not necessarily follow from this that the nominee is not a good man. But it does mean that if he will not take orders from the undisclosed bosses who made him, then these eminent gentlemen have been deceived."

RUSSIA proposes to establish what its rulers assert will be the only real democracy in the world. A new constitution, to be promulgated next fall, has been drawn up under the direction of Josef Stalin, the dictator, and will be acted on by the all-union congress of soviets on November 25. This document guarantees protection for private property, suffrage for all citizens more than eighteen years old, regardless of race, sex, religious belief, and previous activities or property ownership. The communist party will be retained as the only recognized political organization.

There are to be two legislative bodies, the council of the union, elected by the people, and the council of nationalities, selected by the present indirect system. These two bodies will elect a board of 31 officials to run the government.

Gilbert K. Chesterton, dead at sixty-two, weighed more than two hundred and fifty pounds. As every doctor will surmise, he died of heart disease. His weight explains the unnecessarily early death. A pump breaks down if you overwork it; a sixty-two - year - old heart breaks down if you compel it to supply with blood—food, drink, oxygen—too many billions of cells.

Arthur Brisbane

Every cell in the body must have, from a laboring heart, its supply of food and oxygen, pumped every second.

The brain, alone, contains thirty thousand million separate cells, according to Doctor Carrel. In his 100 surplus pounds, Chesterton carried scores of billions of useless cells, each making an unnecesary demand on the heart.

Do not let yourself remain fat after forty if you would live to be old. To become thin and stay thin requires some effort of the will, often more disagreeable than dying.

At one of the ultra-radical workers' meetings in France, the red flag displayed and the communist "international" hymn sung, there was radical and determined talk. Monsieur Thorez told the meeting the factories of France would soon belong to the workers.

If the plan is sent through some workers would discover that it takes more than a red flag and a hymn to run a factory and make it pay; if factories did not pay there would be no payrolls. Brains count as well as hands. The eyes carry no load, but they direct the feet and hands.

South China thought she wanted a war with Japan, and will probably have it. Troops from a Japanese naval squadron land at Amoy, Fukien province, accompanied by the usual convincing flock of airplanes.

War with Japan is the easiest thing to have, if you really want it.

In Canton, South China's big city, parades and mass meetings were organized to increase and express hatred of Japan.

Russian sovietism came quickly, and might go quickly; signs of a breakdown are seen already. Those that do more and better work get special rewards; engineers, chemists, scientists occupy fine apartments compared with those of ordinary workmen. That is hardly "straight communism." Now Russia will have a constitution and house of parliament, important steps in the direction of conservatism.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

Washington.—On the outgo side of the national ledger the relief item is the most important single factor in determining how far the budget falls short of balancing. Any congressional debate on relief, therefore invariably brings in the budget question. Recently the senate debated relief—and heard about the budget.

The most searching examination of the budget problem came from a Democrat—Senator Byrd of Virginia, frequent critic of New Deal policies. He brought up the question, Why is the budget suffering from progressively increasing relief expenditures when business conditions are improving?

On the basis of figures supplied by the acting director of the budget, Mr. Byrd calculated that in the fiscal year starting July 1 the government would spend for ordinary purposes and relief $600,000,000 more than in the current year.

"This means," he said, "that we will spend nearly $1,000,000,000 more than in 1935 and $3,000,000,000 more than in 1933; yet conditions today are greatly improved and the need for relief and governmental expenditures is much less than in those previous years."

In 1937, he continued, the government will collect $1,600,000,000 more in taxes than in 1936, "and still the deficit continues in an alarming amount."

Similar protests against increasing taxes were voiced at last week's general meeting of the Iron and Steel Institute in New York. Remarking that relief expenditures were mounting at the same time that employment and payrolls were going up, Eugene G. Grace, president of the institute, said that "the only sure way to cure unemployment and solve the problem of relief is to increase production."

As a sidelight to all this discussion of government spending, the treasury announced plans for our largest peacetime financing operation—$2,050,000,000—which was offered on June 15. It will increase the public debt to about $32,600,000,000, the highest yet.

All States Share

Benefits under the Social Security act are now shared, under one or more of its provisions, by all the 48 states as well as Hawaii and Alaska, according to a survey made at the office of the Social Security board.

The survey revealed that, since February and up to the period ending June 30, the Social Security board has approved grants in aid or administration expenses totaling about $30,000,000. Most of this has been paid to those states that have qualified under unemployment compensation and public assistance laws approved by the board.

The board also has made payment for expenses of administering unemployment compesation laws, as well as grants for other social services carried on under the children's bureau of the Department of Labor, the Public Health service and the office of education.

Scope of Aid Widened

Although not every state has shared in all the benefits of the Social Security act, the number of states submitting plans for approval to the Social Security board is increasing. Eleven ates and the District of Columbia eady have had unemployment com- ation plans approved by the board. ut 7,000,000 workers, or 40 per cent all those eligible in the entire ntry, now are covered by approved ns.

n addition, plans for old-age as- nce (free pensions) have been ap- ed by the board for 32 states, h now have 628,674 needy aged heir rolls. Twenty-one state laws ring assistance to more than 20,000 persons have been approved by oard.

neteen state plans for aid to 3 dependent children also have approved.

board has made no official es- s of federal benefit payments, unofficial tally revealed these approximate figures for the February-June, 1936, period.

Public assistance	$22,437,193.54
Unemployment compensation	847,100.39
Vocational rehabilitation	841,000.00
Public Health Service	3,333,333.00
Children's bureau	1,969,916.22

Plans are being made for an enumeration of 26,000,000 wage-earners, who will be covered on January 1, 1937, by the old-age benefit (compulsory contributory pensions) provision of the security act.

Federal Role Indirect

The Social Security act delimits the functions of the federal and state governments. The states have the primary task of administration of laws enacted by them, passing of amendments appointment of staff and organization of unemployment compensation commissions.

The role of the federal government is indirect, being primarily concerned with protecting the state funds and seeing to it that the state organizations are properly administered.

Under the provisons of the act the federal government can insure collection of comparable statistical material that would otherwise be difficult with interstate and federal-state co-operation. Since the federal government is responsible for all expense of state administrations, it is directly interested in the efficient expenditure of this money.

Under the public health section of the security act there resulted a closer co-ordination of health activities of federal, state and local governments, according to Dr. Thomas Parran, surgeon-general of the public health service. Before the act only 540 local health units were in operation out of a total of 3,000 counties in the United States. In three months 175 new local health units were added to this number, an increase of more than 30 per cent.

Eleven states have set up new units for the study of industrial hygiene, bringing the total to sixteen. Grants from the funds under the act have enabled California, Washington, Montana and Idaho to set up special facilities for the control of bubonic plague.

In the realm of special projects Alabama has been assisted in extending its efforts toward the eradication of hookworm and Missouri and Tennessee have been assisted in their fight against trachoma.

Link A. T. T. and "Wealth"

A former Harvard instructor traced for the communication commission's investigation of the American Telephone & Telegraph company evidence he said showed a link between the utility and its subsidiaries and "a large part of the total corporate wealth of the United States."

He was Dr. N. R. Danielian, who under questioning of Samuel Becker, special counsel for the investigation, said that primary consideration of the company in selecting directors was "not familiarity with the problems of the telephone industry, but men who boast wide interests" in other industries.

Danielian contended directors were selected as a "channel of spreading good will."

Summarizing a study of membership in chambers of commerce, boards of trade, Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions and similar clubs, the witness said 35 telephone corporations had spent $4,838,038 for "dues and contributions" in the last ten years.

"It appears," he testified, "that the telephone subscriber has paid the major part of these dues and contributions."

Jobs for 1,660 Youths

Success in placing 1,660 unemployed young people in private jobs by the National Youth administration's 24 junior placement services was reported to Aubrey W. Williams, executive director of the N. Y. A., by Dr. Mary H. S. Haynes, director of guidance and placement.

Representing the efforts of N. Y. A. employment counselors in ten states during March and April the 1,660 jobs were obtained through 2,485 visits to private employers. The number of positions obtained in April was 940, an increase of 30 per cent over the March total of 720.

The 24 placement services included in this report are situated in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Calif.; Bridgeport, New Haven and Hartford, Conn.; Davenport, Cedar Rapids, Council Bluffs, Des Moines, Waterloo and Sioux City, Iowa; Boston, Worcester and Springfield, Mass.; Concord, Nashua and Manchester, N. H.; Brooklyn and Bronx, N. Y.; Fort Worth, Texas; Durham, N. C. (two offices); Chicago and Indianapolis. A twenty-fifth placement service was established in Richmond during May.

Applications for jobs during the two months totaled 6,989. This means that 24 per cent of that total were placed in private jobs.

Of the total 6,989 people applying, more than 6,100, or 88 per cent, were from families not on relief, the report showed. Thirty-five per cent of all the young people who applied have never worked, the report stated. N. Y. A. services are, by executive order of the President, limited to young people between sixteen and twenty-five years of age.

The New Speaker

The new speaker of the house, Representative William Brockman Bankhead of Alabama, is not happy over the manner of his elevation. It was at the expense of the life of Speaker Joseph Wellington Byrns of Tennessee. Less than two years ago both Bankhead and Byrns were battling for the speakership, following the death of Speaker Henry T. Rainey of Illinois. Byrns won.

Speaker Bankhead is a veteran member of congress, having first been elected in 1916. He is a brother of Senator John Bankhead. Speaker Bankhead was born in Moscow, Ala., in 1874, son of Senator John and Tallulah Bankhead.

Speaker Bankhead has been a strict Dixie Democrat.

80 Volts Strong

The voltage given off by the electric eel has been variously estimated at values ranging from a few to 600, and the rapidity of the discharge at about one ten-thousandth of a second, repeated at intervals of about one-tenth of a second. Investigations into the nature of the electricity of this fish have been going on for some time at the New York aquarium, where they have been able to demonstrate that the current may be released from any part of the body with equal intensity; that it is directional, that is, having one polarity at the head and another at the tail; that it is of at least 80 volts in strength, but the fish can regulate the amount it discharges, depending on its mood, and that it can be made to actuate any ordinary electrical circuit of appropriate value.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

SYNOPSIS

Jeb Braddon, young and fantastically successful broker of Chicago, is infatuated with Agnes Gleneith, beautiful daughter of a retired manufacturer. Rodney, a doctor, in love with Agnes, visits his brother, Jeb. Rod plans work at Rochester. Jeb suggests that he make a try for Agnes before leaving. In Rod there is a deeper, obstinate decency and much sterner restraints than in Jeb. Agnes believes to be happy, a girl must bind herself entirely to a man and have adorable babies.

To be happy, a man required a girl; indeed, men declared this and sought a mate more openly, more frankly. Men's voices, at such seekings, betrayed them, as Rodney Braddon's just had done.

"The Deep Sea," her father had dubbed him in contrast to his brother. The Devil (with women) and the Deep Sea! Well, the Deep Sea had phoned from his brother's, the Devil's office, and was on his way to her.

Agnes never thought of making special preparation for him; and he wouldn't have liked it. She kept on the cornflower blue knitted dress which became her slenderness and which deepened, by its lighter shade, the blue of her eyes, and which "went" with her straw-colored hair. The cold wind of the morning had whipped a pink glow into her clear smooth skin.

She procured her own little coupe and drove alone through the snow to the station to meet Rodney.

He, if he could, would have turned back. He sat by himself in the train, going over and over what he had done and what he had set out further to do, and his purpose appeared to him not only hopeless but fantastic. Yet he had spoken the words to her that told he was coming and which implied more. He had no retreat.

Did Jud honestly believe that he had a chance? Or had Jud goaded him to this in the belief that, by speaking to Agnes, however hopelessly, he would be the better for it—the better for putting an end to his impossible dreams?

Standing on the car steps as the train slowed, he passed her. He swung down recklessly, slipping in the snow. When he straightened, she was beside him.

"Little Agnes!" he said, the syllables escaping him. If she caught his exclamation, what difference? He had come to say to her much more.

She felt it.

She asked him after he was settled beside her and she was driving him home: "You haven't had lunch, Rod?"

"I never thought of it," he admitted.

The snow had begun to blow so blindingly that it became almost an adventure to follow the familiar road to the house. It shut in Rodney Braddon and Agnes Gleneith together, away from contact or sight from all others, increasing the tension of their intimacy, though during the drive, Rodney said scarcely a word, and he did not touch her.

In the house he made no attempt to touch her. They went into the pleasant, easy "east room," which on ordinary days overlooked the lake. Now the snow swirling at the wide windows shut them in, as it had when they were in the car.

Rodney appreciated this, and he turned to her, gratefully.

"You'll let me tell you what I shouldn't."

"If you want to, Rod."

"You know the trouble with me. I love you. . . . You sit there, will you? And I'll stand here. I'll not annoy you more than I must. . . . I've said I love you. I've had medical training. I know what love is, or is supposed to be. But it's not that with me when I think of you.

I suppose every hopeless fool denies it. He tries to make himself out better than he is."

"You couldn't, Rod, she said gently.

She was seated where he asked her to be, and watching him, looking up at him, so tall and troubled before her; and a little ungainly, as always, in his brown ready-made clothes.

He was more carelessly molded than Jeb, except in his brow, his chin and his hands. Perhaps especially in his hands, so lean and strong and capable. Her eyes came to rest on his hands, restrained close beside him as his brother's never would have been at such a moment.

How this man fought the appeal of physical sensation! And why did he down it so?

Because he was capable of a feeling beyond his brother's; far beyond any other man she knew.

Agnes recognized this now, if not with her mind, with her stirred instincts, which aroused their needling excitements through her.

"Money means nothing to you, I know, Agnes," he said. "The fact that I've none; that's not my trouble. It's me and my life—isn't it?"

"Your life?"

"The fact that you never could live it."

She said, without thinking, "Why not?" for she did not willfully intend to lead him on; but never, with any man who had made love to her, had she found herself so confused by feeling.

"There'd be nothing in it for you but being my wife."

"What would that be like, Rodney?" Now, why had she said that? Did she want him to break the restraint he held upon himself?

"Being my wife? Do you want me to tell you?"

"Can you, Rod?"

"Can I?" He was gazing at her so that her eyes fell before his, fell to his hands, which he was keeping controlled beside him. "I can tell you all about it—what it will be every hour of the day—and night," he said, so that she hardly heard him.

"I thought for a time, Agnes," he went on, "of taking up another line, for you. I mean, with the idea that it might just possibly increase my chance with you. Not to make more money, but to make myself different, for you. But I couldn't be different."

"Not you, Rod."

"No; it'd be no use. There's only one job I can care to do. You know what it is. It's—to find out what makes one person live and another die. What brings one child health and strength and happiness, and what condemns another to be a cripple or to pain or wretchedness for life. What does it? Not God, not Divine judgment and punishment. We don't believe in travesties like that any longer. And it's not the sins of the fathers, in most cases, either. It's some condition we can discover and correct. It's some secret of biological balance that we can uncover. It's simply a problem of biology that I've got to work at as long as I'm any good. I couldn't turn to anything else if I tried to. It's the one thing that matters to me—except you.

"I've been trying to put you two together. I mean to imagine you together—my life, as I live it, and you. I can do it in my dreams. Oh, I love you so much; and I can see I'll never have you. . . . Don't mistake me in how I imagined you in my dreams, dear; oh, my dear. You were there waiting for me; that was all. You always were there for me at end of day. Wherever I was, whatever I was doing, I was going back to you. No; I'll tell it all to you. Some day, I dreamed, we'd have a little girl like you. A very little girl with blue eyes and hair like flax as yours used to be. . . ."

"It wasn't strange, Rod. Don't think I misunderstand. Kiss me, Rod."

"When I go, I will, if you'll let me. I couldn't bear it now. I see how you feel—sorry for me. It's plain I can never have you. I won't make you say it. I know. I always knew. That's why the dreams began; but they'll be gone now, too. That's best, I suppose. . . ."

Ten minutes later, Rodney left; and she knew better than to try to detain him. "I'm driving you back to the station," she said.

"No. Let me leave you here. . . . You can send me, if you will, with Simmons; but you—let me kiss you now."

Never with such tenderness, never with so much strength restrained, had a man's hands clasped her. His arm did not encircle her. His hands upon her shoulders, he drew her to him; she lifted her lips and kissed him. Once; that was all; he did not try to repeat it.

"Again, Rodney," she whispered, reaching up, stretching on tiptoes to offer herself once more.

"You don't repeat—death," he denied her. . . .

Agnes moved about the empty house, gazing out at the snow.

She could do no differently about Rodney; she did not love him. She felt for him with a keen pity which had no equal in her meetings with men; but she did not desire him. Was love—desire? Was that the decisive sensation in your life?

Was admiration for a man, sympathy for him, caring for him, nothing in comparison? Did no qualities in you or in him count, unless you desired him?

Flames were leaping and snapping from maple logs freshly laid on the huge stone hearth of the hall; and the green glass eyes in the pair of jaguar heads on the wall opposite gleamed their reflection of the dancing fire.

Five years ago her father had shot the jaguars in Brazil, having suddenly found need to cease to be a manufacturer of electrical equipment and to become, instead, a hunter set upon traversing tropical jungles to kill something dangerous and savage. Among other trophies, he had brought these back, installed them here, and dubbed them "Hansel and Gretel."

This house, which had never been as happy as the home on Easter Lane, had descended undeniably after that. Of course the jaguar heads had nothing to do with the descent; they were simply a symbol of what had happened.

What had happened in this house?

Rogna, the little Swedish maid, appeared. She was a lady's maid shared by Agnes and her mother; a slender, small-boned, golden-haired, bright-cheeked, impulsive type of Swede. She was overemotional, indeed, but discreet. Rogna, if any one, knew what had happened in this great important house; for Agnes suspected that her mother, in her despairing helplessness to regain what was slipping away, sometimes "talked to" Rogna. Never to a soul would Rogna repeat a word of it.

"Mother's returned?" Agnes asked her.

"Oh, yes! Mr. Braddon just phoned."

Agnes started. Rod? Was he returning?

"Mr. Judson Braddon," Rogna said. "What did he say?"

"He is coming out. He did not inquire whether or not you would be in, Miss Agnes; he said to tell you he was coming out. He will drive."

Twenty miles through this snow! thought Agnes. Jeb would.

"Also Mr. Gleneith has returned to the city. He will be home on his train."

Mother! thought Agnes.

"Do you require me, Miss Agnes?"

"No. Look after Mother, Rogna."

"Oh, I will!"

The two girls gazed at each other, both knowing. There was no sense whatever in Agnes' pretending before Rogna. "She mustn't use rouge, Rogna. Don't let her. It—it doesn't become her; and it won't do her any good!"

Lying in the deep, warm water in her bath of palely tinted porcelain, Agnes shut her eyes and saw, not Rod on his train traveling away from her, but Jeb forcing his car toward her through the snow. She could see him strain and laugh and swear when he skidded, but come on, on, on to her, whatever tried to hold him. Even in her imaginings, he stirred her. Come on, Jeb! Oh, come on!

"Rod—dear, dreaming Rod. I'd like to love you! I would; but I don't." And he hadn't so much as let her say it.

It wasn't the fact that Jeb was making money, and Rod nearly none, that widened the difference between them. For Rod was right about it; money did not rule desire.

Money might be one of the factors that destroyed it. Money—or at least the epoch of their marriage in which the most money had come—was separating her mother and father.

Before a mirror on the other side of that wall between their rooms, her mother frantically was trying to make herself more attractive to Father, and to look younger. . . . But Rogna would watch the rouge. Rogna would not let Mother look ridiculous to Father when he came home—ridiculous to Father, who used to kiss her when they hugged Agnes between them in the big bed of the house where Mother had been a bride.

Oh, what was love?

At last Father came. Baskerville, the huge boar hound, had affectionately knocked his hat off, and he carried it crumpled. Cravath, the butler, had opened the door.

"'D evening, Cravath. . . . Hello, Light One!"

That meant her and no one else. Always, as long as she could remember, it had been Father's greeting. Light One! Dark One! His two daughters—his two babies, once. Beatrice always had been dark, like Mamma; Agnes light, like himself.

"Dark One! Light One! Dark One! Light One!" he used to accent in rhythm as he tossed and caught his children in turn before he kissed them—Dark One! Light One!—and shooed them away.

He bent and kissed Agnes now, careful to keep his snowiness from her dress. "Hello, Light One!" he repeated. "How's Dark One?"

"Oh, she's fine, Father!"

"How're the busters?"

"Father, they're wonderful!"

"Good. Where's your mother? In?"

"Yes, Father; she's in."

"Good."

Cravath had taken his things and disappeared, leaving father and daughter alone before the fire. Agnes liked to have him linger with her, but the thought of her mother, waiting for him, tortured her. There had been a time when, if she had not met him at the door, he would have leaped up the stairs, two steps at a time, to find what was the matter.

Now he stood, back to the fire, without impatience. He had been away for a week in New York City; and his daughter, swept as she was with affection for him, and with pride in him, and with gladness in all her memories, could not down disturbing doubts. What had he "done" in New York during seven days — and evenings and nights?

He was full of feeling; and how good-looking he was! You could not possibly think of him as a grandfather.

He was now within two years of fifty, and he didn't appear forty. He honestly didn't.

His hair was as youthful as Agnes' own. He differed from hers, however, in having a crinkle in it which made it take tousling well. (Always, in those mornings when she had run into his and Mother's room, he had been tousled. Now she had not seen him so. But had some woman in New York? The idea would not down. It wouldn't!)

Father and daughter shared the same blueness of eye and straightness of nose. Indeed, in the fullness of her lips and the turn of her good little chin, Agnes was a delicate refinement of him; but even allowing for women's proportions, she was smaller. He was six feet straight, distinctly more than average height; Agnes, for that comfortable countryside north of Chicago where women are tall, was rather under the average, and also, for her height, slighter than her father, though no ounce of "weight" appeared on him. He saw to that, with squash and riding.

Quarries Beneath Paris May Provide Air-Raid Shelters

Half of City Underlain by Artificial Caverns

PARIS.—War-raid shelters for the population of Paris might be made out of the vast honeycomb of old underground quarries that underlie the city, suggests Prof. Pierre Devaux of the Ecole Polytechnique.

Very few people, even among Parisians, know anything about these old quarries, Professor Devaux states. Yet to a large extent Paris owes its very existence to them, for much of the limestone used in the city's buildings, and vast quantities of gypsum also, have been obtained from them. The name "plaster of Paris" is true in a very literal sense: the original material was made and used in Paris, out of gypsum dug from underneath Paris.

Far-Reaching System.

There is a public Quarries commission in Paris, that has charge of these far-ramifying artificial caverns. Their maps, though admittedly incomplete, show that perhaps half of the heart of the city, on both banks of the Seine, is underlain by abandoned quarries. In some of them are the famous catacombs of Paris, containing millions of skeletons.

Professor Devaux does not propose that the living should take refuge among the dead. He rules out catacombs, in his proposed scheme of shelters. He also considers the old gypsum quarries unsuitable, because of the frequent rock falls from their roofs. But the tunnels and rooms of the limestone quarries he considers safe and suitable.

Extensive Project.

Much work and expense would be necessary to make the old caverns safe. Many new entrances would have to be dug, for the old entrances are far too few in number, and too inconveniently located, to enable thousands of people to get underground in the few minutes allowed by an air-raid warning.

Ventilating systems would have to be provided, and means for preventing the infiltration of poison gases. There would also have to be large installations of water reservoirs, toilet facilities, and other necessities for large-scale temporary occupancy. But Professor Devaux considers his scheme practicable, if undertaken in time.

Discovery of New Lung Function Solves Old Human Blood Puzzle

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.—Studies which clear up a 50-year-old puzzle about human blood were reported by Dr. William H. Howell, emeritus professor of physiology in the Johns Hopkins university, at the meeting here of the National Academy of Sciences.

The puzzle was to find where the platelets of the blood are formed. These platelets are little flattened discs which are important because one of their functions is to make blood clot after it has been shed.

The platelets are formed in the lungs, Doctor Howell found.

New Discovery.

This is an entirely new idea. Although the platelets were discovered more than 50 years ago and there have been all kinds of theories as to their origin, function and fate, no one has ever thought of looking in the lungs for their birthplace. Until now medical scientists have thought these important platelets were formed in the marrow of bones where the red blood cells and many of the white blood cells are made. The generally accepted view, proposed by Wright, is that they are produced in the marrow from a species of giant cell, to which Doctor Howell, many years ago, gave the name megacaryocyte.

Now Doctor Howell comes along with the experimental proof that the platelets are made in the lungs. The first evidence was finding that as the blood flows through the lungs it picks up platelets. The arteries always contain more than the veins.

Midget Camera Films Vocal Cords in Action

VIENNA.—A motion picture camera so small and compact that it can be pushed into the larynx, to take films of the vocal cords in action, has been invented by two Viennese scientists, Dr. Kamillo Wlethe, a physician, and Dr. Franz Gerhard Back, an engineer. It is expected to be useful in at least three ways: to study the mechanics of the voice, particularly in famous singers; to investigate the physiology of the production of the various vowel sounds; and as an aid in the diagnosis of throat diseases, particularly those with a nervous involvement.

Blemishes Made Her Old Looking

Face Clear Again with Cuticura Soap and Ointment

Here is a letter every skin sufferer should read. Its message is vital. "There were blemishes on my face, of external origin, and they made me look old and haggard. They were red, hard and large. They would hurt, and when I scratched them the skin would become irritated, and I would lie awake at night and start digging at my face.

"But after using two cakes of Cuticura Soap and one tin of Cuticura Ointment my face was cleared again." (Signed) Mrs. L. Whetzler, 2nd St., Floreffe, Pa., June 15, 1935.

Physicians can understand such letters. The Cuticura formulas have proved their effectiveness for over half a century. Remember, Cuticura Soap and Ointment are also for pimples, rashes, ringworm, burning of eczema and other externally caused skin blemishes. All druggists. Soap 25c. Ointment 25c.—Adv.

WORLD MOURNS WALTHALL

From his native village, Wilsonville, Shelby County, through out his native state, Alabama, his native South, America and the world, which knows and loves him through the screen, which has made his charm a by-word wherever films are shown, Henry B. Walthall is mourned.

The record of hi portrayal of the South's romance and gallantry, from "The Little Colonel" of the silent movie, The Birth of a Nation, through subsequent depictions of the "Old Colonel" with his black string tie and greying goatee, will remain a part of our tradition as long as magnolias bloom and mint juleps tinkle in the frosted glass.

Alabama rejoices that Henry B. Walthall's able art was paramountly exponent of the South, which was bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh. His acting was a flower that bloomed in a heart which beat with the emotions of her brilliant past, her emergence from defeat and her gallant rise to fame in an art so truthfully, purposefully and magnificently portrayed by her gifted son.

THOSE BONUS BONDS

Everybody, from the President down, has been giving advice to the veterans about what to do with their bonus bonds.

We have none whatever.

Most of the veterans are 40 years old, or better, and if they haven't learned by that age what to do with this financial manna nothing that we, or anyone else, can say will have any affect.

As for ourselves, it is useless for the Salesmen to come around to see us.

Those bonds are going into a lockbox to repose for a good long time.—Huntsville Times.

MORE POWER TO G-MEN

J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, otherwise known as the "G-Man," remarked the other day that America's "Public Enemy No. 1" is not any particular criminal, but is politics. Nobody knows better than Mr. Hoover the powerful influence of politics and politicians in the protection of criminals and the encouragement of crime.

It is to be hoped that he can arouse public sentiment to back up his demand that law enforcement in the United States be taken out of politics. Anyone who has been around much can point to many communities in which criminals have established relations with the political groups in power and are all but immune from punishment. In such communities even the law-abiding live under a reign of terror, kowning that the courts the police authorities and even the grand juries are under political obligations which prevent justice being done.

The work of the G-Men in the field of their particular authority has aroused nation-wide admiration, and their chief has won the respect of every law-abiding citizen. Neither he nor his corps can, or should be expected to, clean up the Augean stables, but he has certainly turned the thoughts of the decent people of America to a condition which they have it in their power to correct.

YOUTH ISN'T FOOLED

The revolt of American College Youth against the idea of war, particularly as it might affect the United States, is getting to be something of significance these days.

The trend is in sharp contrast to the youth movements in Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy where the sons and daughters of World War participants are following the same blind path, only to find themselves hopelessly ensnared, as were their fathers, in the toils of the war machine.

The generation now coming into maturity in the United States has profited from the experiences and warnings of its disillusioned predecessor. It, therefore, harbors no illusion about the whole ghastly business of war.

It has not been fooled. That is something for which we may be mighty thankful some day.

THOUGHT FOR TODAY

"Don't worry if your job is small
And your rewards are few;
Remember that the mighty tree
Was once a NUT like you."

With the above thought in mind, we begin another day!

WANTED

A remedy for the JITTERS! This hectic weather brings with it a lassitude and a lethargic feeling which steals thru the hours and leaves us with a "Look down, look down that lonesome road feeling". A complete indolence possesses us. We feel JITTERY because we realize that it is necesary for us to snap out of it, if we perform, with any intelligent degree, the various tasks assigned us. The day is already filled. First, a few household duties await our inspection. The menu is a debatable question. It is too hot to eat, but try and convince a 17 year old "saw mill slugger" from the Atchison Lumber Camp, in training for the football season, that a few little "knick-knacks" are appropriate for the weather. Hear the tirade of objections which fall—and take my advice, follow the line of least resistance, and get the "wholesome, substantial meat and bread" required (no foolin) for this ambitious undertaking. Thinking this "order" over, we decide it best for all concerned to tell our culinary troubles to "Cookie", and shift these responsibilities to her more understanding and experienced shoulders. We then peek into the pantry to check up on "this is and that ain't" —then, swing into the office to find a stack of unanswered mail requiring "immediate attention" A hurried turn around the shop reveals supplies that "aint" in evidenre. The Linotypist smilingly greets us with the statement "You will have to do 16 columns this week—Mr. So and So fell down on his ad". Of course, we take this with a grin. Then L. C. Taylor WHISTLING "Jesus Paid It All" enters the shop and hands us a bill for last week's paper. Of course all these little things are calculated to put you in a wonderfully fine humor. You stop a minute, turn on the "squeaky" fan—and then a friend drops in with the query "RELAXING under the swish of an electric fan?" FLEXATION, my dear, and plenty of it. It takes FLEXIBILITY—PLUS to get around, and frequently we have to stop and give ourselves an over dose from our private stock of the stimulating chemical known as the old HOOEY—as far as ENERGY is concerned, in order to complete the revolutions necessary to make before we can—well, come out HERE—or Wherever you are—but, it IS fun, going "round and round" in circles like "MUSIC" or the proverbial "tadpole in the cow's track" —and greeting our charitably inclined" readers on Thursday morning. And now, for the other side of the picture —the "LUCKY BREAKS" that make our lives worth living and the newspaper game worth playing—

FOR.

The daily routine incident to newspaper office grind is calculated to grow monotonous; hours are prone to reluctantly D-R-A-G along unless broken by some unusual happenings, but when friends express THOUGHT FULNESS in such happy ways as they have evidenced this morning, WORK ceases to be an arduous task, and becomes a pleasantly anticipated joy, so we pause, amid the many discordant mechanical sounds in this little work shop, to search the typewriter key board for some word or group of words which will express our sincere appreciation to the belov ed "Bishop Sisters" for a lovely bouquet of fragrant Grand Duke Jasmine blooms, and for a basket of lucious peaches graciously presented by the talented Kay Wood, who is a former "Georgia Peach" herself, but whom Columbiana now claims for her own. This "delicious" expression of our favorite fruit with the Alabama-Georgia flavor of friendliness, we thoroughly enjoyed and sincerely appreciate. There are colorful snap dragons grown in Lady Lightcap's own flower garden, which adorn our little desk today, and all in all, we are decidedly on the "up and up." Not even a "blue note" from Dad Christian's emporium of "small change," nor a "past due" note annotated with his characteristic "trade mark" can curb the "merry mood" on this June morning. Whats the use of worrying anyway we have FRIENDS who think about us—FLOWERS to look at, and PEACHES to eat—so we are just "ich-ca-bibbling" along and glad of it!

COLUMBIANA CHATTER

Mrs. Myra Hamner Miles has returned to Camp Hill for a visit with her parents, Dr. and Mrs. H. T. Hamner.

The many friends of Earl Wood are delighted to hear he is improving after undergoing an operation in Birmingham.

We happily have in our possession, what we believe to be the first cotton bloom in Shelby County. It was thoughtfully sent us by our good friend, J. F. McGraw of Vincent, and was produced on the farm of J. H. Thompson, by E. H. Gates. Any body contradicting this statement? That is, has King Cotton bloomed in all his glory earlier on Mr. Anybodys Farm? If so, bring in the evidence. If we hear nothing from you—the honor goes to Mr. Gates.

How much did you win or lose on Fritzy or Rastus, last Friday night? Fritzy won because he was not afraid of the dark—maybe!

Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Allen of Birmingham ,with their attractive little daughter, Betty June, were cordially welcomed visitors in the Democrat offices on Friday.

Want a delightful room for the summer? We know of one available!

Mr. and Mrs. Lou Hoynes and son, Lou Jr., after a month's vacation in Columbiana, spent with Mrs. W. A Parker, have returned to their home in LaFayette, Indiana.

Are you interested in having your mattresses renovated—Call us, we shall be glad to put you in touch with an Agent who guarantees satisfaction.

Want to have your house re-covered on a convenient time plan. We refer you to Gordon Allen, with Estes Lumber Company. Call 2751 and we shall tell Mr. Allen, who makes the Democrate office his headquarters when in Columbiana.

Want a TYPHOID SHOT? See Nell Davidson who smiles while she "immunes" you!

Mrs. Pratt Houston, former resident of Columbiana, received a cordial greeting from her many friends on Saturday when she spent a few hours in the "old home town." We acknowledge a thoughtful personal appearance in our office, and we enjoyed a "neighborly" chat as we used to indulge in when the Houstons were our "just across the street" neighbors.

Milton Allen, successful salesman with the Towery Motor Co., spent Monday in Columbiana.

Mrs. Violet Luther, widely travelled native of London, England, now residing in Montgomery, spent Tuesday in Columbiana.

It is a fortunate occurence and a happy combination too, when Mother and Daughter can exchange places so capably and each enjoy a vacation. This happens in the case of Mrs. Grace Carter, Secretary for L. H. Ellis, Attorney, who is now vacationing in Florida, while Sara Nell continues to tap the typewriter in this busy law office as a good substitute.

Fred Harrison, can and does SELL automobiles. There is a reason. He has a good sales line, he has "any kind of car you want" will take you anywhere and to make a long story short—the "PROSPECT" must be pleased! He is a former resident of Columbiana, now located with Hayes Motor Co., in Montevallo—travelling "high-wide" and still "handsome" as any actor on the screen in Hollywood. You said it—he has our O. K. —and has had for many years.

Luther Lyon, prominent planter of Wilsonville, was in Columbiana on Tuesday and we were delighted to draw up and reserve a chair in the Democrat circle of readers for 1936-1937 term.

E. Carter of Columbiana Route 2 received a round of applause as he was reseated in the Democrat circle of readers this week.

MR. AND MRS. G. C. GLASS

When Columbiana places her seal of approval on her citizens, she will "stay with them until the end." So the many friends of the popular little couple, Mr. and Mrs. G. C. Glass of the Yellow Front, who have made their home in Columbiana for the past two years, have banded together with a petition to the Yellow Front authorities for their retention as Managers of this popular trading center in Columbiana. Mr. Glass is popular, efficient, courteous, capable, tactful, resourceful, and Lady Glass, petite and pretty brunette, is the per fect combination of grace and charm needed to take care of the feminine fads and fancies in this large department store.

We have not had the pleasure of talking with the "powers that be" in this State owned and operated chain of stores, but we join legions of patrons, customers and friends in asking that Mr. and Mrs. Glass remain in charge of the Yellow Front located in Columbiana. We feel a personal interest in their retention, as they are our commercial neighbors and we feel we can personally vouch for the note worthy achievement they have made in the business circles, and for their meritorious worth as valuable citizens of the little town in which we all feel such a distinct pride in calling—HOME. Columbiana needs and covets their friendly citizenship!

Friends of Dr. Joel E. Chandler regret that he is confined in his home by illness, and unable to go to Philadelphia for the Democratic Convention. We had hoped the Doctor could be present, and give the old Liberty Bell at least one little tap for us—just to start things right again down among the "Quakers."

A Memorial Service will be held at Robert's Chapel on next Sunday, and a program of music interspersed by lectures recalling the early history of this picturesque old Church which will celebrate its 93rd year of existence, will be offered throughout the day with dinner served to members and their guests.

Mrs. F. B. Williams and daughter, Margaret, have moved to Savannah, Georgia, where they will join Mr. Williams, who has been stationed there since March. Columbiana regrets to lose this interesting family.

Beware of the Fourth of July.—Did you know that last year's celebration brought serious injury to 7,000 persons? The mounting toll of Independence Day accidents is cause for deliberation.

"The moon is very old and worn,
And yet though wan and white
Like many ladies whom we know
She still looks well at night."

The Rev. Ed Bird, former citizen of Columbiana, who died in Phoenix Citp, Sunday, was buried in Columbiana on Tuesday.

F. A. GORMAN, JR.

We personally share the grief of friends and loved ones in the death of young Frank Gorman Jr, of Vincent, who was one of the most conscientious Christian gentlemen we have ever known. A prominent Democrat, and a public spirited citizen whom the entire County honored and respected. Truly, his passing is a distinct loss to those whom he served and to those of us who had the happy privilege of claiming his friendship. His life was a credit to his generation, his memory one to be long and beautifully cherished.

Wll Curlee, former resident of Columbiana, now residing at Fairfield, renews his allegiance to the Democrat, and states it is the best medium for keeping in touch with Shelby County friends whom he does not want to forget, even though his work is away from the home base.

PAGING KIDDIES

We are continually receiving requests for a renstatement of the Kiddies Kolumn—and Personal Mention also heartily joins in the chorus of wanting this little bright bit from Childhood Land—so we are here with paging our friend Joyce Jackson who is quite a talented young journalist, Hazel Ruth Swann at Pell City, Pat Holladaye in Kingston, N. C., Louise Lovelady of Columbiana, and others who have been sincerely missed. Tell us of your vacation plans—what you are doing and well, in the County. Its vacation time and just let us hear from all the Kiddies I am sure you are filling these days with happy experiences which would be interesting to other Kiddies and to the grown ups too. Shall be looking for a letter from you.

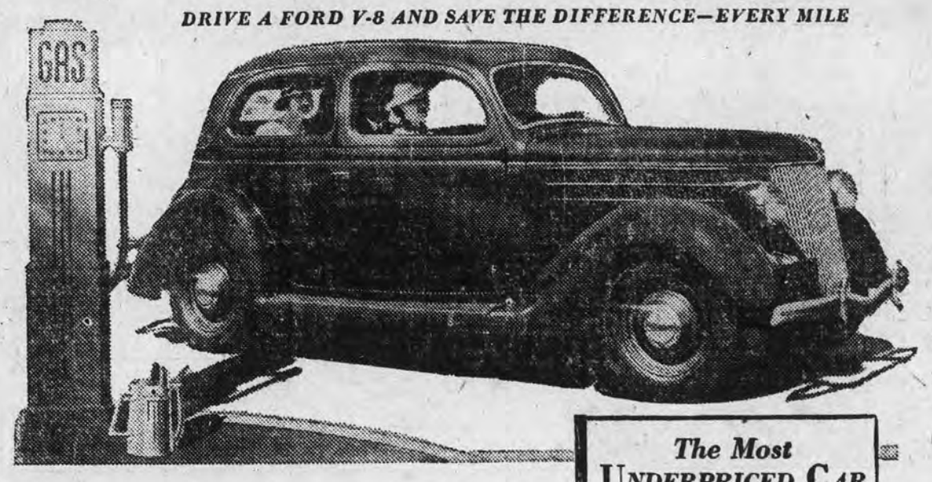
Economy that goes far beyond the thrifty use of gas and oil...
DRIVE A FORD V-8 AND SAVE THE DIFFERENCE—EVERY MILE



Ford economy does not stop with economical use of gasoline and oil. From the day you buy a new Ford V-8 until the day you trade it in, you save the difference every mile.

1. FORD EXTRA VALUE. Modern V-8 engine. Welded steel body reinforced with steel. Safety glass all around. Centerpoise ride on 123" springbase. Super-safety mechanical brakes. Big 6.00x16" air-balloon tires on deluxe models. Torque-tube drive. Clear-vision ventilation and windshield that opens. ALL THESE FEATURES AT NO EXTRA COST IN THE FORD V-8.

2. FORD LOW MAINTENANCE COST. Only Ford owners enjoy the big economies of low priced Genuine Ford Parts and the Ford policy of exchanging factory reconditioned parts (including the V-8 motor) for a fraction of the cost of replacement of similar parts in other cars.

3. FORD HIGH RESALE VALUE. Because more value is built into the Ford V-8, more unused value is left when you trade it in. Striking evidence of this fact is the high value the public itself puts upon used Ford V-8 cars which has made the Ford always worth a higher percentage of its original cost than any other car.

AUDACITY

By ANNE MILLER

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

MISCHIEF danced in Evelyn's eyes as she reached for the telephone. Calling the Grays' home, she asked for Mr. Arthur Gray.

When an interrogatory masculine "Yes?" came she gulped nervously.

"I am a reporter from the Daily Clarion," she began.

The answer was another "Yes?" cold and unencouraging.

Evelyn quickly decided on an appeal to sympathy.

"Please," she said, "don't hang up on me. This is my first job and I've got to make good. When may I call for an interview?"

"Surely," replied the man, "you are making a mistake. There is no reason why I should be interviewed."

"My instructions are to interview Mr. Arthur Gray who arrived yesterday morning from New York and is now staying with his mother at 310 Grenville road. You are that Mr. Gray, aren't you?"

"All details tally," admitted the man, "but, really, I am not sufficiently prominent in any way to merit a newspaper write-up."

"O-oh! Evidently you don't realize that a man who has written popular song-hits is viewed with interest. But—as you seem to think me intrusive—" The girl sounded hurt and despondent, as her speech faltered, and the man hastened to say courteously:

"I am sorry, Miss Reporter. I wish I could help you, but really, I am convinced there is some mistake."

"Please," she begged, "haven't you five minutes to spare this afternoon, so I won't have to report failure?"

"Well—" he hesitated, "my mother is entertaining at tea. Why not be one of the guests?"

"Last thing conceivable," was Evelyn's thought. Aloud she said: "No, I couldn't do that, but," audaciously, "I shall let you meet me outside the Yellow Tearoom."

"Most unusual reporter!" commented the man. "But I'll call your bluff. Will 3:30 do?"

"Lovely," she enthused. "Park near the front entrance."

"Good. How shall I know you?"

She laughed softly. "I'll know you," she said, and hung up the receiver.

Donning a light blue coat, soft felt hat and gaily printed scarf, she was out of the house.

A taxi brought her within a block of their meeting-place. From there she walked, warily scanning the automobiles. Yes—there it was—a beautiful runabout with the New York license plate—and at the wheel the young man of whom she had heard so much and whose photograph she had seen.

As his eyes were turned towards the entrance of the tea-room he did not notice Evelyn's approach. Only when she stepped on the running board did he turn quickly.

"Why—er?"

"Miss Reporter," she smilingly enlightened him. "Do let's get out of this maze. No, thank you, no tea!"

"I am yours to command," he assured her. "Let me help you in."

The man's attention was on his wheel for several minutes after they were comfortably seated. Evelyn waited. At length he spoke:

"Please don't keep me in the dark. Are you really connected with the Daily Clarion?"

"No," she replied, "nor shall I beat about the bush, Mr. Gray. I wanted to meet you in order to save you from a conspiracy."

At this the man laughed. "The plot thickens. Where's the villain?"

"Oh, don't laugh!" she begged. "I'll try to explain. Your mother has set her heart on marrying off a certain young woman to you, and she is going to do considerable maneuvering to accomplish her object."

"And what concern is it of yours?"

"Only this: If she succeeds I shall be the main sufferer. I am one of the principals conspired against."

"You don't mean—?" He looked at her in amazement.

"I do! Your mother has been singing your praises to me for the last six months. I have seen photographs of you and silly snapshots, and locks of blond hair tied with baby-blue ribbon. I know just how you lisped—and that as a youngster you were bow-legged."

The man groaned.

"You'r Evelyn Brent?" he asked.

"I am."

"That model of maidenly reserve and deportment?"

"As you see," she unblushingly admitted.

He continued: "That Dresden China doll? That sedate well-mannered conservative young lady? Oh, my poor mother—how could she be so deceived?"

"Sarcasm being unbecoming to my gentle sex, you have the advantage," she replied. "But do let me justify my boldness. Your brother's fiancee, Martha, is my cousin. Dreadfully tactless sort of girl she is. Only this morning she told me that you and I will literally be thrown at each other. That annoyed me, so I thought that, with our combined efforts, yours and mine, we could dodge each other successfully."

Exaggerated courtesy tinged his reply: "Forewarned is forearmed. It would have been impossible to resist you, had you been leagued with the conspirators. Really, I am touched by your solicitude."

Annoyed, Evelyn glanced at her wrist watch. "Now that everything is explained," she said, "if you'll stop your car, I'll get out here."

"Oh," he cried, and his manner was wholly apologetic, "I am sorry. I have been rude. After all, we know enough of each other by hearsay to make our meeting proper. I have some business to attend to at the A. B. Co. If you don't mind waiting the few minutes it will take, I shall then take you home. After today the 'dodging' may begin."

To this Evelyn reluctantly agreed, and in a short time they were in front of the A. B. Co. As the man alighted from the automobile, and walked through the swinging doors of the store, Evelyn noted the set of his broad shoulders, the grace of his carriage.

"But," she reflected, "all handsome men are insufferably vain."

When, after an impatient 20 minutes of waiting, Evelyn saw him coming back, with sparkling eyes and twitching mouth, as though enjoying a joke, she was perturbed.

"You must think me very silly," she half asked, half affirmed, when he was again seated beside her.

"I am non-committal, young lady," he replied, as he started the automobile.

They had gone but a hundred yards or so when a coupe sped by them. Its occupants called to them, slowed down and waited.

"Oh!" moaned Evelyn. The occupants were her cousin Martha and fiance, John Gray.

The man beside Evelyn grinned. When abreast his brother's car, he slackened the speed of his own.

"Where you two going?" called John, while Martha eyed her cousin in surprise.

"To mother's tea-party," Arthur informed them. "Step on the gas. We'll follow."

Evelyn wilted in her seat! The joke was on her, she admitted. She was powerless to protest. To do so was to disclose her silly behavior of the afternoon. When Mrs. Gray's apartment was reached she went in docilely. Mrs. Gray received her as a matter of course, convinced she had come with Martha.

Then, to everybody's amazement, Arthur drew Evelyn's arm through his own, and turned to his mother.

"Mother," he said, "she is all you said she was—and we've bought the engagement ring." He drew from his pocket a tiny box, his hurried purchase at the A. B. Co.

"I may have to change it," he continued to his amazed listeners. "I bought it hurriedly."

A fog seemed to envelop Evelyn's mind. She could not speak.

"You little devil," she heard from Martha, and she felt herself being vigorously embraced by the two women.

Arthur stood apart, smiling, but a trifle uneasy as to the possible outcome of his audacity.

At length Evelyn regained speech. She broke from Martha and Mrs. Gray.

"I won't be browbeaten into anything," she cried hysterically. "I am an emancipated young woman!"

Gently Arthur took her hands in his. "I shall be your slave," he whispered. "We'll leave 'obey' out of the marriage service. Won't you take me on probation?"

The excitement was too much for the girl. Her head went down. He pillowed it on his shoulder. She blubbered. Then—faintly—he heard:

"Only on probation?"

At this, the others tactfully withdrew, John murmuring:

"Some fast workers!"

Sea Is Yielding Mineral Supply in Large Amounts

For centuries men have dreamed of getting gold and other precious metals from the briny waters of the ocean through some chemical process. Today chemists are recovering useful minerals from the sea in large quantities and with profit.

Limitless supplies of magnesium, for example, recovered from the ocean, of inestimable value in strengthening human resistance to cancer and other diseases, and for industrial uses, are available in the sea water, and successful production of the mineral from the Pacific ocean by M. Henry Chesny of the Marine Chemicals Co., Ltd., of South San Francisco, Calif., is reported by the American Chemical society.

Large industrial fields for magnesium compounds, used in steel-making and in the construction of airplanes, automobiles, railroad cars and electrical appliances, have been opened up, it is asserted.

Commercial recovery of minerals from the sea is now proceeding both on the east and west coasts of the United States. Bromine for antiknock gasoline is being extracted on the coast of North Carolina. Scientists, says the American Chemical society, declare that it is only a matter of time until gold, silver, platinum and other precious metals will be "mined" from the ocean on a commercial scale.

"The successful production of inexpensive magnesium salts opens large fields for future applications," reports Mr. Chesny.

"Medical authorities show that there is an alarming increase in certain diseases of the human race in the last decade, such as cancer, infantile paralysis, chronic stomach ailments and certain nervous disorders. It has been pointed out that this has gone hand in hand with a steady decrease in the amount of magnesium salts available for assimilation by the human body."

Green in Operating Rooms

Many hospital operating rooms are being painted light green. This is restful to the eyes of doctors and nurses and affords fine contrast with the highly lighted operating table surroundings. In the opinion of experts, it is the best color that can be used for the purpose.

The Original Milk of Magnesia Wafer

Smart Silks for Spectator Sports

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

IF THERE is one place more than another that daytime fashions show off in a panorama of surpassing style interest, it is at the races. The influence of the French races and Ascot was very evident at the openings of our own American tracks this season. Although there were no trailing skirts there were the reminiscent cartwheels, the tiny elaborate "doll" hats which smart Parisiennes love so well with flower, vegetable and bird trimming—millinery fantasies such as are almost amusing in their eccentricities, yet quite worthwhile in that they are adding such zest to the current mode. Silk taffeta frocks and suits were numerous and set the pace for an interesting style movement. Skirts 14 inches from the ground, any number of short-sleeved dresses and jackets with universally square shoulders were likewise interpretative of new fashion trends.

Typical of the choices of many well-dressed women was the very short black silk crepe suit with a fitted jacket that is worn with an enormous black feather-trimmed cartwheel hat. A huge white kid water lily at the shoulder gave a dramatic touch. Much is being said in fashion circles in regard to water lily colorings and water lily boutonnieres and corsages. As to suits of this type the fashion parade includes them in dark silk failles, in faconne silk taffeta, and of course, the gay printed silk suits are that ubiquitous they are taken for granted.

As to the newer silk prints there is a marked tendency to select tiny neat patternings for daytime wear. Made up in trimly tailored frocks with short sleeves and matching jackets, you have the costume-ideal for going about town and for the practical hours of general activities. Now that summer is nearing the trend toward cool silk sheers, both plain and print are obvious. To glorify these intriguing prints one must be accessory-minded to a high degree, which is not at all difficult since the shops are filled to overflowing with the most fascinating neckwear, gloves, bouquets, belts, footwear and handbags that genius might devise.

Some of the smartest women are endorsing tunics over slim skirt foundations. See the tunic model to the left in the picture. Schiaparelli's new gingham silk taffeta is the fabric chosen for this tunic. It is worn with a red leather belt over a black silk crepe skirt.

Seen at the Belmont race track was the jacket dress centered in the illustration. It is styled of dotted silk crepe, white on gray (a very important color is gray this season). Fitted jacket, square shoulders with big sleeves, and a ruffled jabot on the dress are details that interpret high swank. The bag is white calf, the hat a black straw pillbo with red and chartreuse flowers.

The contrast jacket is a pet project with fashion these days. Note to the right in the illustration the stunning model. Here a black sheer silk dress is topped by a short swagger jacket of white silk crash emblazoned with coin dots in jockey colors—maroon and blue. The hat is of white silk crash with extreme eye-shading brim which is inspired by a jockey's cap.

WHITE LINEN SUIT

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The linen suit in natural or pure white is an important number on the style program for summer. The accent on suits has been most pronounced all spring and now enthusiasm for suits is continuing for summer—suits of linen particularly that are cool and comfortable as temperature rises. The classic white suit here pictured is of linen of superfine grade imported from Moygashel, Ireland. It is particularly smart for town wear when accompanied with dark accessories such as fashion decrees with white. Note the navy beret, the navy-striped silk shirt, the navy gloves and bag. These identical accessories carried out in Dubonnet red are stunning.

A Fox Bracelet

Fur bracelets are next. Fox takes the lead and either bands the elbow or encircles the lower arm just above the wrist.

CIRCULAR LINES FOR NEXT AUTUMN

While most women are concentrating now on the purchase of their summer wardrobes those who are designers of fashionable clothes are concerned about next fall and winter's styles. They are considering the creations shown in recent Paris collections and thinking up ideas to produce something new in the way of silhouettes for the autumn.

The first inkling of the trend which has leaked out of the workrooms concerns the width of hemlines. Circular lines are said to be so well liked that every one of us will be wearing skirts that whirl around us like ballet costumes before many months have gone.

Camisoles and Petticoats Should Be in Vacation Bag

Every young woman's bag packed for vacation this summer will carry its supply of dainty camisoles and rustling petticoats. The favored ones are lace-trimmed. The camisoles are made with shoulder points front and back, and are edged with lace. Many have shoulder straps made of one row of insertion banded on each side with lace. Others are made of sturdy net with Val trimming.

As for petticoats, some are the old-fashioned fine muslin with eyelet embroidery; others are of pastel taffeta, or plaid, or flowered taffeta, with rows and rows of narrow Val lace ruffles.

Swankiest Tailored Suits Are Boasting Lace Gilets

Many of the swankiest tailored suits boast lace gilets. They are dainty and soft and provide just the right background for a beautiful clip, brooch, or treasured strand of pearls. Some of the daintiest gilets have lace fronts and collars and net backs with elastic in the waistline. Others are backless; others are really all-over lace blouses with short sleeves. Alencon, yards of val, or net are the favored materials. If you visit the smart neckwear departments or lace yardage departments, you'll want a supply of gilets to provide variety for your stand-by suit.

Lesson for June 28

REVIEW: JESUS MEETING HUMAN NEEDS

GOLDEN TEXT—Jesus of Nazareth . . . went about doing good.—Acts 10:38.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Our Best Friend.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Because He Lives.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus Meeting My Needs.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC — Jesus Meeting the World's Needs.

The lessons of the quarter center in one supreme person and have one transcendent theme, Jesus Christ the world's Savior. The best method of review for senior and adult classes will be to refresh the mind with the principal facts and leading teachings of each lesson. The following suggestions are offered:

Lesson for April 5.

The great supper represents God's gracious provision of salvation for mankind. The urgent invitation is extended to all to accept Jesus Christ as Savior. The making of excuses illustrates the sin and folly of men in rejecting God's free grace.

Lesson for April 12.

The resurrection of Jesus Christ is the supreme proof of the deity of Jesus Christ. The empty tomb is the divine guarantee that Christ was what he claimed to be, and that his offering on Calvary's cross was accepted by God.

Lesson for April 19.

The center of interest in this parable is not the prodigal son or his brother, but a certain man who had two sons. He who fails to see the heart of our Father God will miss the purpose of the parable. The whole of revelation as it pertains to a sinning race and a pardoning God is swept before us in this narrative.

Lesson for April 26.

The story of the rich man and Lazarus gives us a look into two worlds. In this world the rich man lived in luxury while Lazarus begged at his door. In the other world, their positions are reversed. Death is coming to rich and poor. Worldly condition is not a test of man's relationship to God. The rich man did not go to hell because he was rich, neither did Lazarus go to heaven because he was poor.

Lesson for May 3.

Forgiveness is a Christian obligation. Humility is a Christian quality. Gratitude is an uncommon grace. The nine lepers who were healed failed to express gratitude to the healer.

Lesson for May 10.

Prayer is an obligation on the part of the believer. Spiritual growth is absolutely impossible without it. Men should pray under all circumstances.

Lesson for May 17.

Zacchaeus brushed aside all difficulties in order to see Jesus. He proved the reality of his conversion by making restitution. He was saved instantly upon receiving Jesus Christ. Salvation is a present reality to those who believe on Jesus Christ.

Lesson for May 24.

Jesus warned against the scribes. They claimed to be loyal to the Word of God yet showed their lack of the saving grace of God. In connection with his teaching in the temple, Jesus prophesied of his return and warned against unpreparedness as to his coming.

Lesson for May 31.

The last meal that Jesus ate with his disciples was the passover, the memorial of the national deliverance which pointed to the supreme deliverance to be effected by Christ on the cross of Calvary. In connection with the passover, the feast of the new covenant was instituted. This feast has a double import, looking backward to the great deliverance wrought through Christ's atoning death and forward to the even greater deliverance which he shall accomplish at his second coming.

Lesson for June 7.

Jesus' indescribable agony in the garden shows what it cost the sinless Son of God to identify himself with the sinning race, when in anguish he sweat as it were great drops of blood.

Lesson for June 14.

The crucifixion of Jesus Christ was the greatest tragedy of all history. May the fact of the sinless Son of God suffering for a sinning race, move all sinners to accept salvation at his hand.

Lesson for June 21.

Jesus, having given the disciples the parting message to evangelize the world, ascended into heaven. May these last words of our Lord be received by us as our supreme obligation to take the gospel to every creature.

The lessons of the entire quarter have been rich in teaching material. A faithful presentation of the Bible messages given should mean conversion for some and growth in grace for many.

Pray Continually

Accustom yourself gradually to carry prayer into all your daily occupations. Speak, move, work, in peace, as if you were in prayer, as indeed you ought to be. Do everything without excitement, by the spirit of grace.—Fenelon.

Great Designs

Great designs are not accomplished without enthusiasm of some sort. It is the inspiration of everything great. Without it no man is to be feared, and with it none despised.—Bovee.

TEA TOWELS BRING GAYETY TO KITCHEN

No "afternoons off" for this colored Mammy, for she must "wash the cups and saucers up, and put the clothes away." But you can take an afternoon off and embroider yourself a set of tea towels with these amusing Mammies, for the work goes very quickly, it's cross stitch, outline, running and single stitch. Her gay bandana and checkerboard apron suggest themselves for the brightest floss you can find. A set's nice to donate when Fair time comes around.

50-Foot Waves Are a Myth, Declare German Scientists

Stories of rollers 50 feet and 100 feet high are "mere fairy tales," according to German marine scientists. The highest wave in the widest sea is no more than 33 feet, they reported in Munich after sweeping investigations. "Ocean liners," they declare, "rising on the average to 80 or 100 feet above the surface thus tower above even the mightiest wave."

fellows who have already signed up to go ahead and learn the Scout Prayer and a few songs such as: MacDonald Had A Farm; Tramp, Tramp, Tramp; Taps; Row Your Boat; America The Beautiful and The Star Spangled Banner.

You might add a few Scout yells to the list. First learn those that all the Scouts should know and then if you have some of your own you might practice a little on them. Learn or practice some well known Scout games that can be played around a Council Fire.

You fellows who do not have a uniform pou can easily dress as an Indian Warrior. Your Scoutmaster will be able to help you along this line and if you can catch sister when she is not looking you can make wonderful war paint with her cosmetics. Two large feathers will be enough for the head dress.

Just at present I haven't figured out a good place to hold this Rally. We might consider Shelby Springs or Montevallo Springs of maybe Wilton could suggest a place, if they will. Anyone who has a suggestion for a place to hold this Rally or for a part of the program I would be glad to hear from you.

Again I say that we want to make this one Rally that will never be for gotten by those who attend. To make it just what I said, it will be necessary to have the cooperation of all boys that we can possibly get. We are still depending upon the Scribes of all the Troops to help us in getting htese names.

Wilton Troop Notes

The following Scouts from Wilton will cooperate in a Rally of all Shelby County Scouts: Scoutmaster Hoye Splawn, Assistant Scoutmaster Aubrey Woolley, Clay Lucas, Buren Canant, Fred Adams, Will Little, Winston Hogan, Robert Adams, and James Woolley. There will be more names next week.

Several Scouts attended the picture "A Message to Garcia", which has a meaning to all Scouts.

A special meeting was held Wednesday afternoon but the regular Friday night meeting was postponed due to services at the Baptist Church.

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

* * *

During my connection with Boy Scouts, I have attended quite a number of rallys, Scout Circuses and meetings. Seems that one would expect to see the Cheermaster go into action when he attends one of these get togethers but instead of seeing this it was difficult and sometimes imposible to tell just who the Cheermaster really was.

A journey through the handbook for Patrol Leaders and we find the the Cheermaster one of the most important boys in a Patrol. He is a fellow that keeps the boys smiling and in good spirits. He is the boy that keeps the entire Patrol full of pep and ready to take part in any sort of rally.

Another thing the Cheeleader does is to keep the Patrol ready with new songs and Scout yells. This may include any number of the different types of songs, and especially the type of songs that the boys in his Patrol will like.

The youngest or smallest boy in the group usually makes the best boy for this particular job. For one thing it is an important job by all means, but at the same time it is an easy job. The younger boy is, most of the time, the one who is burdened with the least responsibility. This being true, in most cases, it seem to me that we should give him the easiest job so that he may be able to carry on with the work that is left for him to do.

Bugling may be one of the first duties of the Cheermaster if you care to have the two offices combined. Other duties that will fall in his line of work will be to learn the technique of a real Cheer-leader, learn to do their acrobatic stunts and to yell without geting hoarse.

To better help you who already are the Cheermaster of your Patrol or Troop I am including these well known Boy Scout yells.

American Scout Yell:

Growers Get $61,000 Co-Op Poultry Sales

MONTGOMERY—Alabama farmers this year sold 375,169 pounds of live poultry cooperatively for $60,961 .17, reports A. N. Culver, secretary-treasurer of the Farmers Marketing and Exchange Association.

"I feel", he said, "that one of the outstanding things connected with our poultry shipments this spring was the price we secured on these shipments, which, in many cases, was several cents higher than local prices quoted, and practically all our runs were well patronized because our price was satisfactory to the producers."

The poultry was loaded in 31 cars and shipped to eastern points.

4-H CLUB GIRLS' STORY OF SHORT COURSE MAY 26-29 AT AUBURN, ALABAMA

On May 26th we met Miss Marye Elizabeth Nolen, Home Denonstration Agent, at Calera enroute to attend the State Short Course at Auburn, Alabama. We stopped at Montgomery for a short shopping trip and arrived at Auburn about 12:00 o'clock After lunch we were registered at Langdon Hall. The afernoon was taken up by a rest period and a tour of the lovely campus at Auburn. In the evening we attended the picture show and enjoyed very much "Patty—O—Day."

After putting our room in order (Sara Frances and Cecile were roommates) the next morning we went to breakfast. After morning watch we had assembly from 8:15 until 12:00 o'clock. We appreciated and enjoyed Dr. Duncans welcome address at this time. There were also contests in Clothing, Food Presservation and Home Improvement. After dinner we had a rest period until 2:00 o'clock, which was followed by Council Meeting. We greatly enjoyed a lesson in Forestry, followed by two hours of play. At 6:30 o'clock we enjoyed a picnic on the campus in front of Comer Hall. A very enjoyable part of this day was the Amateur Hour, in which Cecile Cowart took part, giving a lovely dance.

After breakfast and morning watch on Thursday, the 28th, we had assembly until 9:00 o'clock, which was followed by Project Demonstrations until 11:00 o'clock. Club girls from Butler County gave a most interesting play from 11:00 until 12:00 o'clock, after which we enjoyed a most delicious dinner. After visiting the Art Building at 3:00 o'clock, we had another lesson in Forestry, followed by two hours of play. One of the most delightful occasions was the reception at the home of President and Mrs. Duncan.

Immediately after breakfast on the morning of May 29th we reluctantly started for home. From Auburn we went to Tuskegee, where we enjoyed a visit at Tuskegee Institute, one of th largest schools for negroes in the world. From Tuskegee we drove on to Calera and then to our respective homes.

Sara Frances DeMent earned the money for her expenses by carrying the Birmingham News, and she wishes to take this opportunity to thank everyone who helped make this trip possible for her.

Everyone who went to Auburn wants to go back again next year, so let's strat now keeping up our 4-H club record in order that we may attend the State Short Course next year.

Hog Industry Is Showing Increase

AUBURN—Expansion of the hog industry this year may result in a total of nearly 50 million hogs on farms next January 1, reports the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

On January 1 this year there were about 43 million hogs on farms as compared with 39 million at the beginng of 1935, the smallest number in more than fifty years. The peak in hog production was 69 millio in 1923.

Today's motorists seem to resent the fact that there is a car ahead—no matter how fast it is running.

Children And Adults Need Plenty Of Milk

AUBURN—Each child in the family should have a quart of milk per day together with all the cream and butter desired, and adults should have at least a pint of milk per day, advise officials of the Dairy Department of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute.

The use of more dairy products on the farm provides excellent food—reducing both grocery bills and the amount of dairy products put on the market they state.

RESOLUTION

The following resolutions were adopted at an enthusiastic meeting hel din the Court house on Tuesday night, sponsored by the Alabama Petroleum Industries.

WHEREAS, the gasoline tax is a "special" road tax created for but one purpose, that of construction and maintenance of roads and bridges and

WHEREAS, as such, there is positively no justifiable reason for the use of the funds derived therefrom for any other purpose, and

WHEREAS, the Alabama Legislature passed two "Local Acts", House Bill 203 and Senate Bill 45 through "Senatorial Courtesy" at the last session, permitting the diversion of gasoline tax funds to other purposes and

WHEREAS, these "Local Acts" may cause Alabama to lose several millions of dollars in Federal Aid road funds in future yers, which will affect the entire State of Alabama, and,

WHEREAS, Alabama has the highest "special motor vehicle" cost per vehicle and the lowest automobile registration per capita in the United States due to the State 6c, Federal 1c and average Local 1c gasoline taxes, in some localities the total being 10c per gallon and

WHEREAS, the "local" county and municipal gasoline taxes are exceedingly destructive to the business of local dealers and merchants because they drive business out of the area affected,

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED, That this Committee herewith places itself on record as being unalterably opposed to the diversion of gasoline taxes or other "special" motor vehicle taxes to purposes other than the construction and maintenance of roads and bridges, and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, That our State Represetatives and Senator be requested and urged to lend their full cooperation in opposing any and all gasoline tax and other road fund "diversion" measures both "local" and "general", introduced in the Alabama Legislature, and that they also lend their cooperation in passing whatever legislation is necessary to invalidate the two above "local" acts when the Legislature convenes again, and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, That our State Representatives and Senator be requested and urged to oppose any and all proposals which would increase the gasoline tax, and also to actively assist in bringing about a uniform gasoline tax rate thru the elimination of all "local" gasoline taxes.

Cream Standards To Be Considered

MONTGOMERY—Establishment of grades and standards for cream sold in Alabama will be given consideration, when the State Board of Agriculture meets on July 21.

Announcement of this was made by R. J. Goode, state commissioner of agriculture, following a state - wide meeting of producers, creamery station operators and butter manufacturers on June 24 at which time the advisability of establishing such grades and standards for the improvement of creamery and buttery industry in the State was thoroughly discussed.

It was the consensus of those attending the state-wide meeting that everything possible should be done to improve the cream and butter produced in the state.

4,705 Club Boys To Visit Shoals

Heart Drifts

SALVAGE

Speak to me, dear, so when dark days return,
Your voice will echo and my heart will learn
To find your welcome touch and tender ways
Within the magic of one fluted phrase.
—Martha Lyman Shillito

KEEPSAKE

We found each other watching night enfold
The earth. Our very silence seemed to sing
What both already knew. Your kiss foretold
A love the whole of life unites to bring.
But even that enchanted hour with you
Was pierced by thoughts of half forgotten aches;
And with a wisdom which I hardly knew
I garnered bits of beauty for keepsakes.
And now when stars drip silver from the night,
No half remembered silence stabs the heart ;
No shattered dreams come tumbling down to blight
The sweet contentment holdng us apart.
I left—remembering your kiss, your touch—
Before the want of you would hurt too much.
—Martha Lyman Shillito

IN CONCLUSION

I never was one to weep, my dear,
When the end of a journey comes;
Or, having dined at a festal board,
To relish the fallen crumbs.

Either you serve the banquet up
In the style I'm accustomed to,
Or, I'll thank you, dear, for the caviar—
And bid you a polite adieu!

FRAGMENTS OF SONG

Fragments of song! Ravelings of rhyme
Glimpses of sky and sea, and summertime
Voices that rise abovethe noise and din,
And find their echoes in the soul within;
Pictures that memory, with matchless art;
Traces upon the canvas of the heart.
J. W. C.

RETROSPECTIVE

Ah! How much suffering we might be spared
Regrets, remorse—if we could only borrow
Time's clock and turn the hands back when we would!
Ah! How much pain some other life has shared!
This world would be a heaven if we could
But trade a YESTERDAY for a TOMORROW.
J. W. C.

YES AND NO

These two small words sum up the whole
Of good and evil, peace and strife
Uttered just once, either may wreck a life
Or save a soul.
J. W. C.

ADRIFT

A mystic, magic circle of blue sky
That touches everywhere the broad expanse
Of blue beneath it, filling with romance
And dreams, the quiet night;
As you and I drift aimlessly
A half grown moon above
Is drifting thru a starlit azure sea
As silently as we—and life and love
Are synonomous tonight to YOU and ME.

Facing Uncertainties

AUGUSTUS J. COX

—:o:—

In the midst of the shifting conditions of a life of chance and change there are some things that abide. While occasional showers of meteors startle our upward gaze, there is no need for alarm. The great fixed stars are still i ntheir places. In this age of doubt there are some certainties more eternal than the stars. Jesus Christ is the same, yesterday, today, and forever." The very word by which the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews expresses his conviction s full of interest. It is the word "is" At is heart lies the other word "see" It is as though the Apostle had said: "My conclusions are the result of diligent observation and profound experience."

Then, too, it would often seem as though things fall upon us out of season. Anxieties that are natural to mature life trouble youth, the disabilities of age and manhood, and the troubles that we reasonable expect to pass early in life revive to add consternation and bitterness to our closing years. We are confounded by a thunderbolt out of a blue sky or by frost in the time of roses. Adversity comes in unexpected forms. The strong man develops a diseased organ; the trusted friend betrays; gilt securities change into waste paper; the popular candidate is defeated; the rock on which we built proves a stone of emptiness; the gate of the church yard receives the desire of our eyes; the brightest of sunshine is suddenly succeeded by the deepest of shadows. Adversity comes in unexpected ways. It is looked for on the highway, and it crosses the field. It gets at us by crooked pathways of which we could never have dreamed.

To this extent, then, we are the sport of the circumstances. We are challenged by losses and sorrows that no shrewdness could predict, no prudence provide against, no intervention break or soften. The almanac foretells the order of the seasons, the eclipses of sun and moon, the changes of the weather, but furnishes no hint of the anxieties which agitate our hearts and homes. The uncertainty places us altogether in the hand of God. The one thing of which we may be sure is, that nothing continues in one way. There is only one thing that will enable us to face the else intolerable certainty of uncertainty, and that is, to fall back upon the promises expressed in the thought, Jesus Christ is revealed, "the SAME YESTERDAY, TODAY and FOREVER."

Democrats Renominate President Roosevelt—Drought Again Causes Crop Destruction — International Conference Considers Mediterranean Problems.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT was renominated by the Democratic convention in Philadelphia in a demonstration of great popular acclaim.

President Roosevelt

The convention unanimously adopted a strong New Deal platform and voted the abolition of the historic two-thirds rule.

The sessions were marked with extreme enthusiasm. Party harmony and a determination to stand militantly on the administration's record in the past three years and present a united front in the coming campaign characterized the convention.

The abolition of the two-thirds rule for the nomination of candidates was one of the significant achievements. This rule, which had been in use for more than 100 years, was superseded by the adoption of the rules committee's report recommending that at future conventions only a bare majority be required for nomination. While some southern and the eastern and western states opposed abrogation, they were reconciled to it by the committee's recommendation that changes be made in the apportionment of delegates.

The platform pledged continuance of soil conservation, benefit payments to farmers, a sound currency, a balanced budget and a constitutional amendment if necessary, to achieve the party's broad social program. It praised the accomplishments of the New Deal in a preamble, declaring that it planned to continue them in the interest of the nation. The platform's keynote was that the Roosevelt administration has put and will keep the nation "on the road the recovery and prosperity."

Regarding the Constitution, the platform declared that while the Republican platform proposes to meet national problems by action of the separate states, the Democratic party recognizes that minimum wages, maximum hours, child labor, monopolistic and unfair business practices, dust storms, drouth and floods could not be handled by states. It stated:

"If these problems cannot be effectively solved by legislation within the Constitution, we shall seek such clarifying amendments as will assume to the legislatures of the several states and to the congress of the United States each within its proper jurisdiction, the power to enact those laws which the state and federal legislatures within their respective spheres shall find necessary, in order adequately to regulate commerce, protect public health and safety and safeguard economic security. Thus we propose to maintain the letter and spirit of the Constitution."

In addition to soil conservation and benefit payments, the farm plank pledged the Democrats to financing share-croppers and tenants in buying lands; favored commodity loans on farm surpluses and retirement of ten million acres of submarginal land from production and rural rehabilitation.

Reiterating the "good neighbor" policy, the foreign relations plank reaffirmed the party's neutrality program pledged to keep the nation out of foreign entanglements. It reasserted the reciprocal tariff policy, but demanded "adequate" protection to farmers and manufacturers against unfair foreign competition.

Denouncing monopolies and concentration of economic power, the platform declared that the administration would "vigorously and fearlessly enforce the criminal and civil provisions of the existing anti-trust laws."

Other planks pledged: Expansion of the social security program; continuance of rural electrification; protection of the rights of labor to bargain collectively; extension of federal housing projects; just treatment of war veterans and their dependents; extension of the merit system through classified civil service; freedom of speech, press, radio, religion and assembly; projection of public works projects to aid unemployment; opposition to Communism and "the menace of concealed Fascism.

THE specter of drouth stalked in the Northwest. Damage to crops on heat-parched farms in South Dakota, Wyoming and Montana caused great concern and recalled the disastrous drouth conditions of two years ago.

Railroads serving the drouth areas agreed to place emergency freight rates into effect on live stock shipments to other grazing areas. Wheat and corn crops have suffered severe damage, reports indicate.

In Washington, a relief program for the drouth-stricken northwest states was mapped out by Relief Administrator Harry L. Hopkins. Work relief projects designed to give work at once to 5,000 farmers in the Dakotas and parts of Wyoming and Montana, whose crop lands have been laid waste for the seventh consecutive year, were planned.

In the Middle West the fact that June of 1936 has been cooler than the same month two years ago has offset the serious effects of lack of rain. Figures on June rainfall for 1936 and 1934 compiled by Nat C. Murray, crop authority of Chicago, showed that Ohio had 39 per cent of normal this year and 90 per cent in 1934; Minnesota 46 per cent in 1936 and 92 per cent in 1934; Missouri 26 per cent in 1936 and 62 per cent in 1934; and Kansas 37 per cent in 1936 and 65 per cent in 1934.

Added to the seriousness of the drouth situation was a plague of grasshoppers that swept over eastern Nebraska, threatening to destroy hundreds of square miles of crops. The swarm was reported to be 100 miles long. In spots the insects were said to be so numerous that they hid the sun as they passed over valuable farm lands.

MEETING in Montreaux, Switzerland, an international conference sought settlement of military and naval problems in the Mediterranean. The conference had been called by the powers as a result of Turkey's request to fortify the Dardanelles, which were demilitarized under the Lausanne treaty of 1923.

The possible threat of Russia's growing naval strength caused an alignment of the British and Japanese. Japan announced it was willing to accept any limitation on Japanese warships authorized to enter the Black sea, providing similar restrictions were placed on Russian warships leaving it.

Russia demanded free westward passage of warships and submarines out of the Black sea through the Dardanelles, adding she was unable to see why other powers not bordering on this body of water desired unlimited passage to it. Because of her mutual assistance pact with the Soviet, France was expected to side with Russia.

REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM LEMKE of North Dakota announced that he would run for the Presidency as candidate of a new political group known as the Union party. Father Charles E. Coughlin, Detroit priest, is the leading sponsor of Lemke's candidacy. Thomas Charles O'Brien of Boston will be the vice-presidential candidate on the ticket, it was announced.

Rep. Lemke

Mr. Lemke made public a 15-point platform embodying demands for refinancing of farm mortgages, old age security, a living wage for all workers, limitation on individual incomes, the establishment of a central bank, the issuance by congress of all currency and its regulation of the value of all the money.

Plans were made for the new party to hold a national convention some time during August in Cleveland.

Mr. Lemke said the Union party has the support of farm unions, labor, the National Union for Social Justice established by Father Coughlin, the Townsend old age pension movement and "all other liberals who have been driven from the old parties."

Mr. Lemke was co-author with Senator Lynn J. Frazier of North Dakota of a $3,000,000,000 farm mortgage refinancing bill defeated in the house of representatives.

ARTHUR W. CUTTEN, who achieved spectacular wealth as a grain trader, died of a heart attack in his home in Chicago. He was sixty-five years old.

An exponent of individualism, Mr. Cutten went his way alone in the grain market, playing his "hunches" against the field. In 1924, he made a profit estimated at between $1,500,000 and $2,000,000 in a corner on the corn market. He repeated his success with a coup in the wheat market the following year.

With a group of associates, he entered the stock market in 1928 and during the boom months made millions of dollars.

Most of his life Mr. Cutten was a "long" trader, who bought for the rise in the market, but following the crash, he is said to have become a "bear" or short seller. His operations as a bear in the Chicago Board of Trade brought his suspension by the grain futures administration for two years, but he won a reversal of this ruling in the United States Supreme court.

STRIKES and industrial difficulties continued to harass France, although their ultimate solution was forecast in a conciliatory attitude assumed by the new "popular front" government toward the French chambers of commerce. Representatives of the chambers of commerce received assurance from Premier Leon Blum that no further manufacturing plants would be tied up by "folded arms" strikers, whose number at their peak reached approximately 1,000,000 employees.

In the meantime a strike of sailors in Marseilles was settled after a three-day refusal to work, when the shipowners capitulated to the strikers' demands. Fifty ships were affected by the walkout. The sailors demanded a 40-hour week, vacations with pay and bedsheets on their bunks

THE death of Bernhard W. von Buelow, secretary of state for foreign affairs in the Hitler cabinet, removed one of the most skilled of Europe's diplomats. Von Buelow, who was fifty-one, was an expert on the League of Nations and gave his country valuable counsel when Germany began to consider rejoining the league. He was noted as a studious and hard-working official, with a vast amount of detailed information always readily available.

A "blueblood" of the German nobility, the diplomat was a nephew of the late Prince Bernhard von Buelow, imperial chancellor. He was one of the first of the German nobles to associate himself with the republican regime after the collapse of the empire in 1918. Although different in background from Hitler, he nevertheless enjoyed the chancellor's confidence.

In Russia, Maxim Gorky, early foe of the czars who became a hero of the Soviet regime and its outstanding writer, died of influenza at the age of sixty-eight. Although not a member of the Communist party, Gorky had a preeminent position in Soviet life and was a former member of the central executive committee. Moscow honored him with a public funeral and interment in the Kremlin in a niche facing Lenin's tomb.

THE Seventy-fourth congress adjourned after a session lasting five and a half months during which it appropriated nearly $10,000,000,000 and was faced by some unexpected legislative complications.

In the closing hours the emergency tax bill which is expected to produce $800,000,000 in revenue was passed. Supreme court invalidation of the AAA and Guffey coal bills and the passage of the cash soldiers' bonus over the President's veto upset the budget plans and made such a bill necessary.

Although it was passed by the house, the amended Guffey coal bill designed to remove the objections of the Supreme court failed of passage in the senate. Similarly, the Wagner slum housing bill, which had passed the senate, failed in the house.

Larger than normal appropriations for governmental activities were passed. The bonus, farm payments, relief and the greatest national defense program in peace time history helped swell the total.

Funds for continuing the present relief program were voted; the public works revolving fund was amended to permit more heavy construction projects. But congress failed to approve the Florida ship canal and Passamaquoddy tide dam.

Invalidation of the AAA brought a revised and expanded soil conservation and domestic allotment act; the rural electrification administration and electric farm and home authority were both placed on a permanent basis; the Commodity Credit corporation was expanded; two flood control bills were passed. Labor received attention through the Walsh-Healy bill dealing with working conditions on government contracts. A compromise ship subsidy bill was rushed through in the closing hours. Financial legislation included expansion of the jurisdiction of SEC. Important among business legislation was the Patman bill amending the Clayton anti-trust act regarding price discrimination.

A number of important bills failed of enactment. Among these were the Pettingill long and short hauls bill, stockyard regulation, Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage bill, and bills on the 30-hour week, extension of the railroad co-ordinator's tenure, anti-war profits, alien deportation, enlargement of the federal trade commission's power and treasury agency service.

FOLLOWING the lead of Great Britain, the United States formally revoked all sanctions imposed against Italy during the recent Italo-Ethiopian conflict. A proclamation by President Roosevelt declared all previous communications dealing with the sale of munitions of war, loans and travel by Americans on Italian ships was revoked.

Stanley Baldwin

Although the sanctions were against both Italy and Ethiopia, in practical application they were used only against Italy, since the United States did not supply the African nation with any war materials and the empire of Haile Selassie had no ships of its own.

The French cabinet agreed to abide by any action which the League of Nations may take in cancelling sanctions against Italy.

The British government's decision to abandon sanctions was defended in an address by Prime Minister Baldwin as the only alternative which would prevent a suicidal war plunging western civilization into "barbarous anarchy."

Baldwin asserted:

"We think it is right to drop sanctions because they are useless and ineffective.

"There is only one way to alter the course of events as they have thus far taken place. That is by going to war.

"I do not know a single nation in Europe that is prepared for that. I would not cast my vote for that course."

A BATTLE to recover all the processing taxes paid to the government under the invalidated AAA was undertaken by the "big four" of the packing industry—Swift and Company, Armour and Company, Wilson and Company and the Cudahy Packing company.

Having won back $45,000,000 when the AAA was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme court the packing industry has decided to attempt to recover from the government more than $200,000,000 paid before injunctions against the tax were granted and subsequent payments impounded.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

FAMOUS WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington.—Out in Montana, Landon enthusiasts are organizing "Republican Typical Prairie State" clubs. Word of this activity has just reached Democratic members of congress from Butte and Helena, and it is, they admit privately, rather disturbing. In fact, it is giving a good deal of concern to Senator James E. Murray, who is up for re-election this year and up to now had not contemplated any particular trouble in winning six more years in the senate.

Montana has not elected a Republican senator since the Bull Moose split of 1919. Even in the wet wave of 1930, Senator Thomas J. Walsh, Democrat, was easily re-elected.

"Nor is Montana by any means a "typical prairie state." It comes much closer to being a typical mountain state. While it is more noted for its mining, it has a good deal of cattle country, as have its neighbors, Idaho and Wyoming.

The significance of the fact that this "typical prairie state" thing has been taken up there is it is apparently resented all over the West, not as a slur on Kansas, which of course was meant, but as a slur on all the country west of the Hudson river, made by a "typical Tammany politician."

All of which makes the real story of this slip, which may prove historic, of some importance.

The speech was originally written by Charley Michaelson, not for James A Farley, who delivered it, but for Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace, who comes from Iowa. Had Wallace delivered the speech there is no certainty that it would have been picked up, though the phrase lends itself to use.

The terrible part of it lies not in the phrase itself—though no one particularly relishes being called "typical"—but in the fact that it came from a New Yorker. People sensed that it was a slip, but that it was the kind of a slip that reveals the real thought of the person making it. It just crops to the surface when the writer, or speaker, is really trying to make another point, but is more revealing of the slant of mind of the writer than the thought he is trying to convey in the context.

Edited by Early

When it was decided that this particular speech was to be delivered by Farley and not Wallace, the document was sent over to the White House for approval. There it was carefully read, and edited, by Steve Early, secretary to President Roosevelt, and in charge, among other things, of press relations.

Early did not skip over the "typical prairie state" line. He was shocked by it, and carefully crossed out the whole paragraph containing it. Whereupon he returned it to Farley's office.

Now comes one of those frequent cases in government life where it is customary to blame the stenographer—though all the reports about it are different. But at any rate, Farley wanted the manuscript neatly typed—not showing the savage editing done by Early.

So a new draft was made, and lo and behold, there was the "typical prairie state" line when it was completed.

Those concerned are not talking, but it is whispered that Michaelson defended the line, and induced Farley to put it back. Which puts both Farley and Michaelson on the spot, the former for yielding and the latter for arguing.

Steve Early was furious. He has more work than can reasonably be expected of any one since the vacancy left by the death of Louis Howe has not been filled. And the idea of his reading speeches and editing them, only to have his deletions restored, angered him aside entirely from any stupidity involved.

But the Republicans out in Montana, not to mention Kansas, seem pretty well pleased.

Note—Michaelson was brought up in San Francisco, which thinks even less of typical prairie states than New York.

Another Hamilton

Back in the days when Woodrow Wilson was President there was a closely knit group of Republican members from what is popularly called upstate New York in the house of representatives. They loved politics for its own sake, as some men like golf, and some poker. But they were really business men before they were politicians.

One of them, Charles M. Hamilton, from the little town of Ripley, in the western part of the state, down near the Pennsylvania line, got interested in the oil business in Kansas. He immediately proceeded to get half a dozen of his colleagues in the house interested. One of them was Bertrand H. Snell.

Hamilton got so interested in Kansas and oil that he decided to give up politics. So he voluntarily retired from the house, his friend Daniel A. Reed of Dunkirk succeeding him. It is a safe Republican district, and Reed has been in the house ever since.

From that time on Hamilton has spent more time in Kansas than he has in New York. But he kept up his old friendships, and for obvious reasons, personal as well as friendly, some of his old buddies retained their interest in his doings.

All of which Charles Dewey Hilles did not know when he thought of heading a "Stop Landon" movement some months back. There were no banners and shouting about the work that Charley Hamilton did for Landon, but how it told in New York state!

Hamilton not only retained his old political friends and colleagues. He kept the friendship of important upstate editors. And the group popularly known as the "Old Guard" suddenly found that New York state had run out on them. In fact, the work done by Charley Hamilton had a good deal to do with the surprise that came when the Empire state delegation was finally polled.

White Makes Slip

All of which is the more interesting because of the rather surprising typewriter slip by William Allen White. Aboard a winning national bandwagon for the first time in his life, Mr. White proceeded to do syndicated articles for the newspapers also. On the day after the convention adjourned, he told the story of Landon's nomination, giving full credit to Ray A. Roberts and his lieutenants among the Kansas editors, and to John D. M. Hamilton, though he never did mention that Hamilton got his political training at the knees of the old boss of Kansas, Dave Mulvane.

But, apparently forgetting that he was in the inner Landon council, and lapsing to his old-time crusading self, he talked about Hamilton (John D. M., not Charley), raising money in downtown New York. "Not much," he said, but some. And then he talked about Hamilton (again J. D. M.) walking in and out of the higher income brackets. To which due attention will be paid by Charley Michelson and the New Deal orators.

But the man who came back into New York state politics after staying out for four national administrations, who came back for the man he had grown to love out in Kansas, and who ripped the heart out of the Northeast's "Stop Landon" movement, was Charley Hamilton.

All of which proves something—when added to the enthusiasm for Landon of all his old classmates, who have been working their heads off for him wherever they might be. Charley Hamilton never met Landon until he had retired from politics and gone to Kansas to seek his fortune in the oil business. Hamilton is the kind of person whose enthusiasm does not run away with him. When he speaks, it means something to his old friends. And he took them all with him for Landon, though many of them had never seen the Kansas governor!

Hit in the Dark

In framing their platform, and for that matter in their oratorical attacks on the Roosevelt administration, the Republicans had to hit without knowing just what the new tax bill would be—whether it would take the form of the house measure, as desired by President Roosevelt, or the senate measure, which the Republicans admit is much better, or be a hodgepodge compromise of indefinite coloring.

Two outstanding members of the resolutions committee which framed the Republican platform, Senator Daniel O. Hastings of Delaware, and Representative Allen T. Treadway of Massachusetts, ranking member of the Republican minority of the house ways and means committee, were also on the conference committee which was supposed to be writing the final draft of the tax measure.

But that did not help them any. For no member of the conference committee, whether he was in Washington, or Cleveland, or on a fishing trip, had an idea what the final bill would be before the final gavel at Cleveland.

The answer is simple. The only man who knew what the answer would be, assuming he had made up his mind, was Franklin D. Roosevelt. And he preserved a discreet silence. Naturally he could not even confide in the little group of newspaper men who go wherever he goes. For to do so was to admit that he was giving the orders, and, while every one knows he is, it would not be tactful, nor even perhaps politic, for him to admit it.

And Roosevelt is generally both tactful and politic!

Difficult Problem

All of which made the problem of the Republicans at Cleveland on the one point on which they hope to score more than any other in the campaign just opening—taxation—considerably more nebulous than is ordinarily conceivable with respect to the paramount issue.

For normally, of course, the party which is not in power has been able to determine what shall be the paramount issue. It is up to the opposition to attack the administration, and it is up to the administration to answer that attack. Where the attack is fiercest, naturally, must be the main defense, and in that spot develops the paramount issue.

Once in a blue moon the party in power is so much more ably directed, or press agented, than the "outs" that it is able to pick the battlefield. There will be some sharp skirmishing to obtain that advantage. It may not be really determined until October.

SYNOPSIS

Jeb Braddon, young and fantastically successful broker of Chicago, is infatuated with Agnes Gleneith, beautiful daughter of a retired manufacturer. Rodney, a doctor, in love with Agnes, visits his brother, Jeb. Rod plans work at Rochester. Jeb suggests that he make a try for Agnes before leaving. In Rod there is a deeper, obstinate decency and much sterner restraints than in Jeb. Agnes believes to be happy, a girl must bind herself entirely to a man and have adorable babies. Rod visits Agnes and tells her of his great desire, but realizes it can never be fulfilled. Agnes' mother is attempting to regain her husband's love. Bob Gleneith arrives from New York. Agnes has disturbing doubts as to what attracts her father there.

There was no mark of deterioration upon him. It was plain that his impulses and his needs for closest, emotional contacts had not fled or even retreated. Plain too, it had been for some time, that they had failed him here. What was he "doing"? What had he done?

"Don't think about it," instincts warned her.

He swung about to her. "When I was in New York, I got out of something I got into awhile ago; and I made half a million. . . . Tell me what you want, little Light One."

"I don't want anything, Father," she answered before she realized how much she was disappointing him; for she was thinking once more of her mother. He would offer to buy her, too, anything she liked; but it was nothing that he need buy which Mother wanted from him. And this half-million additional in his hands would not help her. No; it would not help Mother at all.

"Bob?" they both heard her voice. "Bob? Are you home?"

She had come to the top of the stairs and was calling down.

Agnes saw him start slightly. "Hello, Tricie," he called back. "Wait up there. Coming!"

They screened their first meetings, these days, from their daughter.

"Anybody for dinner tonight?" he inquired of Agnes, as he turned.

"Jeb, I guess, Father." And she added: "Rod was here this afternoon."

"The Deep Sea!" her father said, and suspected aloud. "Why was he taking off the afternoon?"

"He was going away. He's gone."

"I see," said her father, satisfied with that, and he did not inquire whither. "Good fellow. But his brother—how that young man does know his way about!" And he started, at last, for the stairs.

Headlights played on the windows and swung away as a car skidded to a stop.

Jeb came in, cold and stamping and all alive.

She was his goal, this girl who braved her bare arms and shoulders to the chill from the door to meet him. She, above all others and all else in the world tonight, was the sole object he sought, and nothing could keep him from her. That was how Jeb made you feel when you faced him.

"Hello, Glen!" He held her, making her palms press his. "Hello, Glen!"

"Jeb, why did you drive tonight?"

He laughed, and his happiness at the triumph of this arrival thrilled down her arms from her palms held to his.

"Thought the train might not get through, Glen. I had to. Are you glad, a little?"

"Oh, yes, I'm glad, Jeb!"

He ripped open his overcoat and threw it off and upon a chair for Cravath to pick up.

"Rod came?" he asked, as they passed the blazing hearth before which her father had halted.

"Yes; he came. He's—wonderful, Jeb. Wonderful. We talked in there." Why did she indicate the room—and avoid it? She had no idea of taking Jeb to it. Something quite separate from Jeb had transpired in there, and she would not have him intrude upon it.

"But you couldn't do it?" said Jeb.

"No, I couldn't do it."

They were in the great drawing-room, where, on this stormy night, a huge wood fire also was blazing. He turned to her in the warm light, tall as his brother, and straighter. There was no ready-made suit, no marks of carelessness, nothing could make Jeb appear pitiful.

Her mind flew to her mother's room, where there was another man whom she could not picture pitiful.

The four were alone at dinner.

Her mother and father had dressed, for they were going out. There was always, in these days, something for them to go out to, if they wished; and tonight, though he was just home, they utilized this escape from their evening together. So Father sat at his end of the table in his dinner-jacket, and Mother, at her end, in decollete.

She was forty-seven, for she had been twenty-two when she had borne Bee, the Dark One, the daughter like herself. But Bee, after barely three years of marriage and two babies (as Mother had had) was not now as happy as Mamma had been for the twelve years in the "little" house where she had been a bride.

Was happiness shortening? What ended it, once you had it—both of you—as he at his end of the table, and she opposite him, had had?

"We're together! Isn't it good! Good! Good to be together, together so!" That was how the old house had felt. Here it was gone. Most particularly tonight it was gone from Father and Mother. You could feel no current of closeness.

Across the table Jeb sat. He was happy to be here, and to have her here. Of course it was because he was close to her, the table temporarily separating them, that he was happy.

He was in business clothes, as he had come from his office. He and Agnes were not to go out, to seek escape from themselves tonight. Quite to the contrary! Why did conversation drag so?

Her father mentioned Insull to Jeb.

"Stronger every minute," Jeb said. "I'm putting all my people into Mid-West Utilities."

There Mother sat, alone, no longer the closest, most necessary person to any one. Her figure, once as slender, was by no means heavy. Women complimented her upon it, but men had ceased to turn when she passed. She had lovely hands, beautifully-shaped fingers with almond-like nails, which Agnes had inherited. Her skin, though not dark, was less fair than her husband's, and it needed color now.

"Tell Me What You Want, Little Light One."

There was not too much tonight, Agnes thought. There was too little.

They had gone out together, Simmons driving them. The leaping blaze in the drawing-room had burnt down to red-glowing charred logs that lay lazily on the andirons.

Jeb gathered Agnes against him. "Don't fight it," he said. "It's no use. It's over for them. That's all."

"Why's it over, Jeb?"

His arm about her also claimed her right hand with his. He fitted her slender fingers in between his, as he liked to do, and clasped palm to palm.

"Because it's over; that's all any one can ever say. . . . There's just so much in the cup, sometimes, I think, Glen. You can sip it all your life, afraid ever really to taste it; or you can dare to drink it down. That's what they did, I figure from what I've heard from you. They had it all; they took it all, tipped it empty together. If he'd died, or she, ten years ago, it'd been a break for the poets; true love for a lifetime. But why bother about such a thing, Glen? Do you want it?"

"What?" Agnes said.

"Love for a lifetime. Tepid, tasteless stuff you can bear to sip and never need to gulp down. Do you want it? By God, you'll never get it from me. I've had girls, Glen, but never one like you. What we'll give each other will be beyond telling. I don't know how long it will last; and neither do you. And I don't care; nor do you. We'll have it—we'll have it all while we're young. We'll tip up the cup—won't we?—and drink the whole damn thing down while we're living.

"Do you dream your mother today would trade what she'd had for anything else she ever heard of? . . ."

He thrust his free arm under her knees and claimed her close. He arose with her in his arms and took a step or two, carrying her; then he lifted her higher, bringing her face so near to his that he could, by bending an inch more, kiss her. But he did not. Instead, with his lips over hers, he whispered.

It taunted and tantalized her.

"What is it, Jeb, what are you saying to me?"

"The line—don't you know it?—that Francois Villon wrote, dear, for himself and his friends the night before he was sure they were all to be hanged. 'Men, brother men, that after us live, let not your hearts too hard on us be.'"

"But why do you say it?"

"Why, Glen? Because we—God help us, Glen—we are going to be married." And then, at last, he kissed her.

Beatrice Ayreforth had had a sunbath built in her home. The enclosure under the quartz glass roof was like a little Japanese room, with softly padded straw mats fitted together to form the floor, and with a slightly raised section, laid with thicker and softer mats, for lounging upon and sunning.

Here, in the soothing sun, you could play with your boys' round, strong little bodies, and imagine them men—great men, splendid men, inspiring, important and thrilling. When you did this, you omitted imagining them like their father. They must be more than Davis ever would be. Davis, your husband, who was only thirty but for whom you no longer held illusions of greatness or of real importance, though you loved him. Of course you loved him.

He lacked something that, for one, Jeb Braddon had. Jeb, who had been at "the house" last night, as Beatrice had learned when she phoned her father after dinner, to say hello. How much further had Agnes and Jeb "gone" last evening?

Bee wished that Agnes would hurry over.

There she was! They faced each other in the sun, but Agnes immediately bent to the babies, rubbing her hands briskly to be sure of their warmth before she touched the brown little bodies. Bobbie kissed back on her cool cheek after she kissed him; she swept with her lips the soles of Davy's chubby little feet, one after the other.

"How's Jeb?" asked her sister, seating herself before her.

Agnes held to one of Davy's feet. "All right, Bee," she answered.

"Did you go anywhere last night?"

"Not us. Father and Mother went to the Stinsons'; but we stayed home," said Agnes a bit breathlessly.

"What'd you do?" demanded Bee.

"Bee, I guess Jeb and I got sort of engaged."

Beatrice's gaze jerked up. "Don't you know?"

"I know he said we were, Bee."

Agnes leaned over and resorted to clasping both of Davy's feet, and pulling him gently along the mat.

Beatrice quickly touched a bell behind her. "They've been long enough in the sun," she decided suddenly, and bundled her babies into robes. When the nurse knocked, she handed the children out and secured the door again.

"All right now," said Bee, dropping to the mat.

"I liked him a lot last night, Bee. I let him know it."

"How about this morning?" Beatrice demanded.

"I'm going downtown to have lunch with him today."

"But are you engaged? Did you say you'd marry him?"

"I didn't; for I didn't know I would. I don't know now."

"You mean you don't know whether you want to?"

"I guess I want to marry him, Bee."

"Then what in heaven is it you don't know?"

"What it will be like to be married to Jeb," said Agnes. I didn't want to talk to Mother about it, at all. She's too unhappy. You aren't."

"No," said Bee quickly. "How was Father when he got home?"

"No different. He made a lot more money in New York."

"I gathered that. . . . But you and Jeb?"

"He thinks we ought to get married as quick as we can arrange it. Oh, Bee, I never, never had such a day. Rod came in the afternoon."

"Rod?"

"I can't tell you about that. I can never tell anyone about that! . . . Then Father came home; and Mother was making ready for him. . . . Bee, they'll separate when I get married, I know."

"Then I should think you'd hardly rush off and marry."

"But that makes me want to, don't you see? Oh, if you were in the house, you would."

"I wouldn't," said Bee.

Agnes proceeded to Chicago on the noon train. As she neared the city, she wondered, more practically, what plan he had made for her and himself? For she felt that today, of all days, he would have a special surprise for her.

Agnes started when she saw him. How much more hers, since last night, was this man at whom women gazed; and for whom they turned, after they had passed. Now he saw her!

Oh, this was something! She was shaking from excitement as hardly she had last night.

He took her away in a taxi, and still saved the tension of their restraints. He named a restaurant where a few of their set were sure to be. So they sat side by side at a little table, looking out upon the wide, gay room just as if nothing at all had happened since they had been seen together.

So many people gazed at them; and Agnes knew that they whispered to each other: "There's Jeb Braddon."

Agnes' hand on the seat beside her touched his, and his closed on hers briefly only.

"Nothing today," he told her, "or more!"

More than last night? What could he mean? Marriage today? Had he a license in his pocket?

They left the restaurant, and Agnes watched the women looking up at him; he watched the men's eyes on her, and was very satisfied.

He took her into a taxi and gave an address on the North Side.

"I'm going to show you a building, Glen," he told her then, "where I figured you and I would start."

"Oh!"

"I spotted it for us—you with me—long ago."

"How long, Jeb?"

Riot-Proof Prison Will Keep Felons Safely Behind Bars

Newly Granted Patent Has Scores of Innovations

WASHINGTON.—A riot-proof, escape-proof prison has just been granted a U. S. patent here. Novel construction permits guards to "listen in" through microphones on the whispered mutters of prisoners.

Tear gas bombs can be hurled by the keepers through openings so designed that possible revolver bullets cannot strike the keepers. Or, the ventilating system of the prison can pour forth tear gas if needed.

All these are claims of patent No. 2,036,515, issued to R. L. Clark of Rochester, N. Y.

Observation Gallery.

Main feature of the invention is a hanging observation gallery which runs the full length of the proposed prison between rows of cells. Made of bullet-proof steel and glass, an accompanying observation tower is also designed to be gas-proof.

In it the guards would stand watch. Lookout openings of bullet-proof glass protected by louvre slats are built in the sides and floor of the corridor. Through these "one-way" windows guards would secretly keep an eye on the prisoners.

There would also be special openings through which guards could hurl tear gas bombs: novel doors which when opened would act as shields to prevent any prisoners' bullets from hitting the guard while he was hurling a bomb.

Port Holes for Guards.

Port holes through which the guards would aim their guns are large steel balls with a hole in the center just big enough for the barrel of a rifle or revolver to pass through. The steel balls have universal movement in the wall of the corridor so that pistols or rifles poked through them can be aimed in any direction. There is no space through which a chance bullet could enter the port hole.

Fitted in the bullet-proof walls of the gallery would be microphones, protected against bullets and tampering. Placing his ear against any of these "ears," the guard would pick up unusual sounds and conversations of the prisoners.

Antidote for Monoxide Poisoning Is Promised

KANSAS CITY, MO.—What is claimed to be a marked advance in the search for an antidote for carbon monoxide poisoning was reported to the American Chemical society here by Drs. Samuel and Joseph Seifter of the University of Oklahoma Medical school.

In studies on rats, Doctor Seifter found, an injection of the compound known as hexahydroferric chloride resulted in 75 per cent recovery after the animals had been poisoned with carbon monoxide gas.

It is this gas which appears in the exhaust gas of motor cars and leads annually to deaths where drivers run their motors in closed garages.

The new antidote chemical, it was found, is too drastic in its action to be useful on animals higher in the scale of evolution than rodents.

Already a search is being made for variations of the chemical which are less irritating and might thus be used for higher animals. The hope, of course, is that the new line of investigation will eventually lead to discoveries having applications to human beings.

Champion Blood Donor Gave 980 Ounces in Year

CHICAGO.—Raymond Briez works in the public markets of Paris, but he also has a thriving business of his own. He engages in the manufacture of blood, and since he entered the business in 1924 he has sold 257 quarts.

The output of Briez's human factory—his own body—is enormous when one considers that it takes ony 7½ quarts of blood to fill the blood vessels of an adult man. During 1935, Briez manufactured enough blood to supply himself and to give 98 transfusions. Each transfusion averaged about ten ounces or a total of 980 ounces. Last year broke all his previous sales records.

The champion blood donor of Paris started his manufacturing business in a small way. In 1924 he gave blood for four transfusions. The next year his orders jumped to 38. In 1927 the number of transfusions supplied by him attained the astonishing figure of 94 and from that time until 1935 he averaged from 50 to 60 a year.

Land Ho!
The Changing Ocean
Safety and Speed
Much for Science

On Board Steamship Normandie.—Four nights from New York and the ship is at Southampton. The Isle of Wight is on your right. Passengers are landing for England. On your left is France, across the water. You land there later. On old crossings passengers watched eagerly for the first land. Now crossing and landing are about as exciting as a trip by rail from Chicago to Lake Forest, or from Wall street to Forty-second street by subway. You are in Europe before you realize that you have started. The poetry of travel has departed with fast ships on the ocean and automobiles instead of camels on the desert.

Arthur Brisbane

No matter how often you cross this Atlantic ocean, or the North American continent, the crossing is always different and interesting. The ocean, like the wide plains, is forever changing.

Two days ago the waves looked like playthings for children. Last night the ocean changed its mind and rolled the waves up high with a shrieking wind. The steward said, "We shall have to fasten the arm chairs tomorrow," but the heavy ship paid no attention to the waves. The ocean changed its mind again and calmed down.

A speedometer telling how fast the ship moves is operated by a mechanism below the keel that records the speed of the rushing water. Burning oil produces steam; steam power is converted into electric power, and that drives the ship. The captain always knows how deep the ocean is beneath him; an electric contrivance sends a sound wave down through the water to the bottom, which sends back an echo.

Knowing the speed at which sound travels through water, it is easy to calculate the depth. The machine does it for you. It is a feeble sound—one hundred and sixty thousand vibrations to the second. No human ear could pick it up, but the machine records it. Twenty-five thousand vibrations per second is the limit of your ear, and that is not bad for a primitive contrivance like a human being.

Newton D. Baker, secretary of war in the "big" war, tells graduating students of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology it is their duty to "carry science into politics." Scientists, Mr. Baker thought, must seek for "the solution of world problems when the great international crisis comes, as it surely will come."

A sufficient "great crisis" seems to be here now, with many countries wanting to fight each other, different classes already fighting each other, and in this richest country in the world—ten million human beings living practically on charity.

If that is not a real crisis, few would care to see one.

George Bernard Shaw, not yet eighty, says, "I must give up public speaking, I am too old." That surprises you from a Celt and an Irishman. At eighty many men have been vigorous in thought and body; for instance, Pope Leo, Von Moltke, Gladstone, Michelangelo.

Not one of those, however, suffered from handicaps that have aged George Bernard Shaw prematurely; he is a vegetarian and a teetotaler. Youth and strength reside in a saddle of four-year-old mutton and good, light claret, greatly diluted with water.

In spite of England's pitifully weak and belated backdown on sanctions, due to London's fear of Mussolini's air fleet; a backdown denounced as cowardice by Lloyd George, Britain, for face-saving purposes, will maintain a great fleet in the Mediterranean. Mussolini will welcome such convenient air and submarine targets near home as a sort of British hostages to fortune.

M. Auriol announces that France will not devalue the franc any further. It has already been reduced by 80 per cent, as though our dollar had been knocked down to twenty cents instead of fifty-nine cents. Prime Minister Blum knows that it does not pay to scare capital out of its wits, something that our best Washington minds have still to learn. The French workmen will have their forty-hour week and the strikes are about over. The French, a homogeneous people, realize that if they destroy France they will not have much left.

Returning to the real American interest, the defeat of Joe Louis, young gentlemen and old will observe that it is most important in all undertakings not to be afraid, worn out or cowardly. Fighters that Louis had encountered saw before them "an invincible conqueror of men."

A NEW DECLARATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE

Courage, confidence, constructiveness, they were the notes that rang unceasingly through the Democratic national convention which closed last night with President Roosevelt's magnificent speech of acceptance. It was the courage of a party that has met and mastered one of the country's grimmest crises, the confidence of a leadership that has kept faith with the people the constructiveness of a humane and wise spirit that is building new freedom, new wealth and worth on the old and firm foundations of our democracy. No wonder that a convention standing upon sucha record and guided by such a purpose was enthusiastic, or that it renominated by acclamation the President and the Vice President under whom such history has been made

Its councils were harmonious because they ran true to the logic of that history, and for the same reason its platform is a model of clear—spoken, forward—thinking statesmanship. "We held this truth," so it begins, "to be selfevident—that the test of government is its ability to promote the safety and happiness of he people." There are critics, among them Walter Lippmann, who appear vaguely disturbed lest that simple reassertion of truth harbor radical changes in our form and principle of government. But if the disquieted gentlemen will turn to a document written one hundred and sixty years ago. in the same city where the Democratic convention met last week, a document known as the Declaration of Independence, they will find these words: "We hold these truths to be self—evident . . . that all men are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituded among men; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundations in such principles and organizing its power in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

The Democratic platform of 1936 like the New Deal which it ratifies and pledges its party to fulfill, simply reaffirms for the living present the truths and rights of which our republic was born. It means to make real in the lives of the American people of today and tomorrow the safety and the happiness visioned by the Americans of 1776 who pledged their lives, their fortunes and their honor to bring such things to pass. It stands preeminently for human right, and therefore for the fundamentals of honest property rights. It declares uncompromising war against cliques and forces that would imperil or destroy human happiness, weather they be bandits and kidnapers or "malefactors of great wealth who defraud and exploit the people." It declares wholehearted allegiance to an independence that shall be more than an abstract idea, praised by the lips of those who betray it by their deeds—an independence wrought out in the daily life of the men, women and children of our land.

"The issue in this election is plain," so the platform concludes. "We are called upon to choose between a Republican Administration that has and would again regiment them in the service of privileged groups and a Democratic administration dedicated to the establishment of equal economic opportunities for all of our people. Dedicated to a government of liberal American principles, we are determined to oppose, equally, the despotism of communism and the menace of concealed facism. We hold this final truth to be self-evident—that the interests, the security and the happiness of the people of the United States can be perpetuated only under Democratic government as conceived by the founders of our nation."

The spirit of the New Deal is the spirit of the old Americanism, risen again in a time of doubt and challenge to renew the faith and set free the energies of man. The leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt is of the same intrepid, the same creative type that built our government's foundations. He has come not to destroy, but to fulfill. And a people true to their best traditions and their most vtal hopes will sustain him at the ballot box.

WARNING FOR THE FOURTH

We cannot have too many reminders that the "safe and sane" Fourth of July is still to be attained.

Fireworks still are dangerous things for children. Last year they killed two dozen persons and blinded 57. This year, unless parents are for more watchful than they were last year, explosives will exact an equally heavy toll.

Under existing aws there is not very much the police can do to prevent these tragic accidnts. For the most part, the job is up to father and mother. If they can't keep fireworks out of their youngsters hands altogether, they can at least see to it that the things are discharged with the proper care.

A firecracker, after all, is nothing but a miniature bomb. It needs to be handled with the same kind of caution that is given to its full-grown military brother.

But he must dig into his pocket for certain other forms of transportation . . .

● Last year the Louisville & Nashville Railroad carried 35 million tons of freight of all kinds—from sand to silk. The patron paid about ¾ of a cent per ton for each mile this freight moved. Passengers paid an average of 1.6 cents for each mile they rode on L. & N. trains. Out of the earnings from these low rates the L. & N. paid all of the expense of operation and upkeep, as well as large taxes on its property.

● On inland waterways Mr. Taxpayer bears a large part of the transportation cost, yet generally the consumer buys his goods no cheaper. Mr. Taxpayer actually plays Santa Claus to concerns operating on the rivers—for example, it costs the taxpayers $136,000 per mile to build the locks and dams on the Ohio River; they pay $4,000 per mile per year to keep them going. The L. & N. built and maintains its own right of way for less than one-half these amounts.

● Good authority states the taxpayers' contribution to the construction and maintenance of highways is not compensated by the commercial users; that the average 20-passenger bus pays about $436 per year toward road building and upkeep, while its fair share of the cost is $1,051, and that the average 5-ton truck pays $366 per year when it should pay $1,629.

● Enormous funds are spent for lighted airways, routes and airports, yet commercial users pay no direct tolls on what the taxpayer furnishes.

● The railroads do not get any such help. At the same time they pay taxes on those things used by some of their competitors. Notwithstanding this, and despite strict regulation, the railroads are doing the country's major transportation job, with constantly improving service.

● Give the railroads a break too.

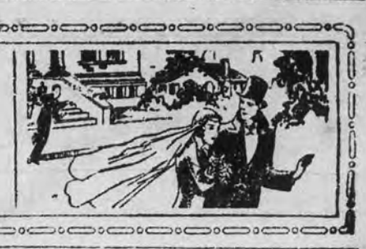
Social and Personal Mention

MILDRED WHITE WALLACE, Social Editor



FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

"He came when times were perilous
And hearts of men were sore beguiled
And having made his note of us,
He pondered and was reconciled.
Was ever master yet so mild
As he, and so untamable,
We doubted, even when he smiled,
Not knowing what he knew so well"—

The above lines vividly describe our idea of the dynamic personality and matchless leadership of our President. Who among the large crowd of Roosevelt Nominators, gathered in friendly fashion on the Court House lawn on Saturday night to hear the acceptance speech fall from his lips, but felt his sincere and forceful leadership? Was there even one, among the throng who lacked CONFIDENCE in his far reaching humane program? A strange and tremendous change has taken place in our country since Roosevelt has been in office. It is tragic that the President is unaware of the intimate FRIENDLINESS he has created in the hearts of his people—A FRIENDLINESS that lies deep in the hearts of each individual who has fallen under the spell of his well modulated voice as he begins each fireside chat with the well known pharse "MY FRIENDS!"

OUR PRESIDENT! Few have ever spoken of a predecessor in these friendly terms—Coolidge was familiarly called "CAL"—Harding, termed "HARDING"—HOOVER, reminds you of a vacuum cleaner or the domestic HOOVER APRON. It remained for FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT to universally capture the term "OUR PRESIDENT" which is invariably spoken with a note of pride in the voice that comes from a radiant glow of friendly interest in the hearts of his adoring people.

FEAR—the greatest enemy of mankind has been conquered under his leadership—and CONFIDENCE has been restored! Under the banner of DEMOCRACY thousands have re-enlisted, and on last Saturday night renewed their allegiance to this magnifcent leader for "the duration of the War".....

It is superfluous to continue a discussion of a self evidentfact which is, thanks to the marvel of the age, known as RADIO—now as familiar to each child in the United States as it is to the grown-ups—but lines from the pen of Lowell, written many many years ago, seem an especially fitting tribute to OUR PRESIDENT today!

"They could not choose but trust
In that surefooted mind's unfaltering skill,
And supple tempered will
That bent like perfect steel to spring again and thrust.
His was no lonely mountain peak of mind,
Thrusting to thin air o'er our cloudy bars,
A sec mark now now lost in vapors blind;
Broad prairies rather, genial, level-lined,
Fruitful and friendly for all humankind,
Yet also nigh to heaven and loved of loftiest stars."

Writing and thinking about the recent Democratic Convention Classic of the age, we were happily surprised on Monday morning when our good friend and former school mate —P. M. Pitts, promient legislator-attorney from Chilton County, walked into the office accompanied by two gentlement who were the Texas delegates on this memorable occasion. One, a former native of Shelby County—Walter Pitts, son of a former resident—and with him a gentleman by the name of Vickers, who looked the part of the typical Texan and wore a panama sombero which he stated created as much of a sensation in New York as the live Democratic Donkey created in Philadelphia We enjoyed hearing first hand information regarding this interesting epoch in our country's history—and the gentlemen who related the highlights were no less interesting than the subject they so capably discussed.

MR. DEEDS GOES TO TOWN

Truly a more profitable two hours could not have been spent than reliving this "true to life" pictorial presentation. Not all pictures can come and receive such unanimous praise from an ever whimsical public—but this one deserved it. Who could not live thru the scene with Gary Cooper as he sat stunned in the Court room at the accusations and misrepresentations of his blameless and altruistic life! His intentions distorted until he could not recognize them. His very individuality—natural impulses—so misjudged that he sat speechless amid his self appointed arbiters. How true in many instances —in an every day existence! Possibly, this strictly human document artistically portrayed on the silver screen struck a responsive chord in the hearts of those who were fortunate enough to see it! At any rate, it was a LIFE lived stripped of all detestable HYPOCRISY! Mr. Cooper attempted to live his life according to his own individuality—his ideals—his utterly lovable traits of human kindness—and THEY tried him for INSANITY. The screen isn't the only battle ground where honesty and SINCERITY of purpose wage their verbal pleas for REASON and SANITY, rather than the continuous barrage of cryptic, false assertions daily uttered from warped and sordid souls so steeped in their own evil thoughts and conceits, so blinded by their own shadowy lives, that they cannot conceive of "one who hath light within his own clear breast—may sit in the shadow and enjoy bright day—but he that hides dark thoughts and foul deeds benighted walks under the noonday sun" or words to that effect. I vaguely remember having to remain after school while a pupil of Dr. Spright Dowells to memorize this poem—this much of it STUCK. It is rather good to remember! You have probably reasoned from this outburst of non-understanding on my part, that I persoanlly offer congratulations to the Roxy Theatre for their picture program on last Sunday afternoon.

And speaking of the SUNDAY MOVIES!—COLUMBIANA is the funniest, friendliest, most inconsistent, adorably cute little place on the top of this globe. Many "natives" have dropped by to express their reaction to Sunday movies—Were it not so typical and had we not lived forever and a day here—we would not dare say what we are about to. For instance, here is one of the remarks—"You know, I always go to the movies in Birmingham on Sunday, but I cannot afford to go in Columbiana!" When my optics flew open to mildly inquire WHY if it was all right "not to get caught" in Birmingham, it was all wrong to be "caught" in Columbiana on Sunday at the movies—we were not assured by the answer anything that warranted the "right and wrongness" of the question. And, we are still wondering WHY its all right to go to the Alabama—and all wrong to go to our own friendly, delightful little ROXY. But maybe we are just dumb—funny that way—or something. We seem to be "all wet" on so many propositions. Its just another X the unknown quantity for "Yours Truly". In other words—"P-i-x-i-l-a-t-e-d"— I guess!

Shearer Leon Hines, talented and versatile daughter of Dr. and Mrs. J. A. Hines of Siluria, is spending the summer in New York and is combining her ambitious program with instructive educational work, mingled with entertaining tours around Manhattan. Little Miss Hines was accompanied by her teacher, Mrs. Mae Price, Julia Riser, Julia Anne Price, and Lula Seaman Price. We send across the miles a plea to Shearer for a letter to be published in the Democrat for the Kiddies of Shelby County who would enjoy hearing some of the interesting happenings from this vantage point.

Hon. Sam Curry, prominent planter of Linger Longer Farm, near Wilton, spent Friday and Saturday in Columbiana, the guest of his daughter, Miss Delilah Curry.

It is almost the 4th of July and we want a WATERMELON! We want one "when dey goes punk, day's ripe" but "when day goes pank, dey's green"—one that has already been "punk-ded"! Know anything better than a luscious slice of ice cold, red juicy watermelon? I like 'em red with black seed. Come on Mr. Farmer and bring us one by the office. We are eager to write you up!

SERMONETTES

We happily call your attention to a new feature for the Democrat which we take pride in introducing this week. SERMONETTES, by the Rev Augustus J. Cox, Presbyterian minister of Montevallo. We had the privilege of meeting this gentleman during our sojourn at the Conclave, and eagerly sought his fluent penpoint paragraphs for our weekly circle of readers. Mr. Cox combines a brilliant mind with a magnetic personality. He is a deep thinker, a conscientious pastor and one devoted to his people whom he so capably serves It is a distinct "feather in our little caps" to be able to point you to the first of a series of articles which will appear in this paper. The title "FACING UNCERTAINTIES!" On next Sunday morning at the Presbyterian Church in Montevallo, Mr. Cox will deliver at the Worship service a sermon bearing the title "LIBERTY THROUGH RELIGION." A large and appreciative congregation will greet this distinguished speaker.

A cotton BOWL from the plantation of E. L. Crumpton decorates the desk this Wednesday morning—the first BOWL we have received. We send congratulations to Mr. Crumpton and thanks for the "King Cotton specimen.

Dr. J. A. Keller, State Superintendent of Education, was an interesting visitor in the Democrat office on Wednesday. His program for educational projects for the State is a far reaching one and deserves serious consideration from the people composing the State's voting list.

AN ANSWER TO A QUERY!

"Under the Courthouse Dome" has been a feature in the Democrat ever since we became identified with this "most distinctive weekly in Alabama' Its absence during the past few weeks has been commented upon. Now, listen, Readers—"Yours truly" slipped quietly thru the corridors immediately after luncheon one day this week—and here is the "low down on the high ups". Mr. Henley, who is a prominent member of the Legislature, had not returned to the office. Probate Judge Len C. Walker was gracefully reclining on the desk with one arm pillowed rather comfortably ——under his head — ASLEEP— we judged. A peek into the Board of Revenue Office revealed Cecil Duke esconced in his cozy desk chair head thrown back—and taking his "beauty sleep". Henry Naish—gone to hunt a CHECK-MATE! L. C. Abbott wrestling with FIGURES, FIGURES, FIGURES-sheets and reams of them! Jesse Weldon and the adorable MARY? Ah, my little dears that would be telling. But I'll wager that chocolate milk was good all right Loretta Head, looking for the elusive FRANK! Calvin Weldon just in from a fishing trip on the Gulf with unbelievable Fish stories to relate. The Sheriff's force worn out with RAIDS—and a car load of BEER stored for evidence in an important case soon to be tried! Mrs. Roberts quietly disposing of her many duties in the Probate Office, unruffled and as calm and efficient as the day is long! The Board of Education holding a meeting in Superintendent Appleton's office arranging for faculty vacancies, etc., for coming semesters. P. O. Luck, busy, could not "get in"! So we were told by the popular Secretary, Mrs. Young! So that's what WE saw when WE made the weekly rounds. Interesting? Not very---but Oh, so comfortable! And it is so hot! We could not blame them for inactivity! It rather made 'em more HUMAN! We could not blame them but we dismissed the idea of any news for this week—however, we promise to "wake 'em up" before next Thursday—if we are living after teling the honest to goodness truth on 'em!

THE COMING OF THE HOLY SPIRIT IN POWER

LESSON TEXT—Acts 1:6-9; 2:1-11, 32-38.

GOLDEN TEXT—But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.—Acts 1:8.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Keeps His Promise.

JUNIOR TOPIC—A Promise Made and Kept.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—New Power Through the Holy Spirit.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Empowered for the World Task.

I. The Missionary Program (1:6-8).

The work incumbent upon the Church is witnessing to Christ's gracious salvation to all the nations. After this is done, there will follow the preaching of the gospel of the kingdom by converted Israelites (Acts 15:14-17; Cf. Matt. 24:14). This was not clear to the disciples, therefore they put the question, "Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" The Davidic kingdom shall be established, but not until after the gospel of the grace of God is preached and the body of Christ is completed.

1. In Jerusalem (v. 8). This was done by the twelve immediately following Pentecost.

2. In Judea and Samaria (v. 8). This was done by the disciples after the hands of the persecutors were laid on them. Not only the twelve but many others took part in this.

3. Unto the uttermost part of the earth (v. 8). Beginning with the first foreign missionary enterprise, this work has been carried on till the present time.

II. The Coming of the Spirit (Acts 2:1-11).

The power of the early Church was the Holy Spirit. The watchword of God's mightiest men throughout the centuries has been "not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts" (Zech. 4:6).

1. The time (v. 1). It was on the day of Pentecost. By "day of Pentecost" is meant the feast which was held fifty days after the wave sheaf was offered (Lev. 23:15, 16). It was observed by presenting two loaves made of the new meal (Lev. 23:17). These loaves were baked with leaven, while leaven was rigidly excluded from the passover feast (Lev. 23:6).

2. Upon whom the Spirit came (v. 1). Cf. 1:13-15. The twelve and others to the number of 120. The coming of the Spirit was not merely for the twelve but for all believers, all the members of the body of Christ. They were in one place with one accord waiting for the fulfillment of the Father's promise (Luke 24:49). If the church would be with one accord in one place, wonderful blessings might still be expected.

3. The marks of the Spirit (vv. 2-4). These marks were external and internal.

a. External. (1) The sign of a mighty wind. There was no wind, only the sound thereof, suggesting the all-pervasive, life-giving influence of the Holy Spirit. (2) Tongues of flame. Each of the 120 was crowned with such a tongue. The tongues show the practical purpose of the Spirit's gifts and the fire indicates his purifying energy, purging away the dross and making fit His witnesses. (3) Speaking in foreign tongues. For these humble Galileans thus to speak caused great amazement.

b. Internal. This is seen in the transformation wrought in the disciples. They now have great courage and self-possession. Peter, who a little while before was cowering before a Jewish maid, now with lion-boldness stood before the thousands of Jerusalem, and a little later before the chief rulers of the city, and declared that they had murdered their King.

III. The Converting Power of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:37-42).

Many people were convicted of their sins—about 3,000 repented and were baptized. This revival was real because—

1. They continued steadfast in the apostles' teaching (v. 42). They did not grow cold or run after every new teacher that came along.

2. They continued in fellowship with the apostles (v. 42). The surest way to grow is to keep in fellowship with Christians. Spiritual indifference is sure to follow the neglect of the fellowship of the brethren in Christ.

3. They continued in the use of the means of grace (v. 42). They broke bread together.

4. In prayer. The apostolic church was a praying church. The Christian life cannot be lived without prayer.

Works of True Merit

Works of true merit are seldom very popular in their own day; for knowledge is on the march and men of genius are the videttes that are far in advance of their comrades. They are not with them, but before them; not in the camp, but beyond it.—Colton.

Great Things

Between the great things that we cannot do and the small things we will not do, the danger is that we shall do nothing

Democrats United for Roosevelt and New Deal

Wild Demonstrations in the Philadelphia Convention—Flexible Platform Adopted and Two-thirds Rule Abrogated.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union

Convention Hall, Philadelphia — "What this country needs is four more years of the New Deal under the administration of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. And that is just what this country is going to get."

Such in effect was the expressed belief and confident determination of the Democratic National convention of 1936.

With complete and beautiful unanimity the delegates again put at the head of their party ticket the names of Roosevelt and Garner. If there was one among them who didn't like this, he wisely held his peace. All those who had anything to say—and most of them had—were confident, vociferously or serenely, of a sweeping victory in November comparable to that they had in 1932.

Before it concluded its labors the convention did another notable thing. It voted to abrogate the old rule requiring a two-thirds vote for the nomination of candidates. The southern states fought the change stubbornly in the committee on rules and voted against it on the floor, but they were outnumbered.

Platform Draft Was Revised

Whatever other dissension there was in the convention related to the platform upon which the candidates were to take their stand, and this was carefully confined to the committee rooms. Senator Wagner of New York, chairman of the resolutions committee, had been in conference with President Roosevelt in Washington and brought here a well planed lot of planks which had the approval of the chief. But there were two startling political developments shortly before the convention opened which required much revision of the platform. First of these was the formation of the third or Union party with Congressman Lemke as its standard bearer. Second was the open letter to the delegates here signed by Al Smith, Ex-Governor Ely, Bainbridge Colby, Ex-Judge Cohalan and Ex-Senator Jim Reed of Missouri. This rather astounding document urged that the convention discard Franklin D. Roosevelt and nominate a "real Democrat" or else abandon the old party name. The five eminent gentlemen said that if this demand were not complied with, and of course they knew it would not be, they would be forced to take the field in opposition to the New Deal and its leader.

The letter from Smith et al. was received here with angry scorn, silent contempt or fierce declarations that it meant nothing more than five Old Deal votes lost to the cause. But the Union party was something else again. It really caused much trepidation in the minds of the leaders, who realized that the prospective combination of radical and dissatisfied farmers, followers of Father Coughlin and adherents of the late Huey P. Long now shepherded by Rev. Gerald Smith might well lead to the loss of a number of states and certainly would draw heavily from the New Deal vote unless something were done about it.

Many thought the best plan was a decided liberalization of various parts of the platform though this would necessitate moving Mr. Roosevelt quite a distance from the "little to the left of center" position he had chosen. Conservatives who have opposed many of the New Deal doings but still remain in the party ranks, fought stubbornly against this shift to the left, and the subcommittee that had the building of the platform in hand spent long and weary hours debating the proper wording of the resolutions.

Gives President Wide Scope

As finally decided upon, reported to the convention by Senator Wagner and adopted by that body, the platform is a cleverly devised affair which dodges many issues and leaves the President free to follow almost any policy he may determine upon as occasions arise. It is flexible in the extreme. Starting off with the "self-evident truths" that the nation was brought to the brink of ruin by twelve years of Republican rule and that in three years under Democratic administration it has been revived and put on the road to restored prosperity, the document sets forth the services of the New Deal in the way of protecting the family and home, safeguarding savings and investments and laying the foundations for the aged, orphaned and infirm. The consumer is then assured briefly that he will be accorded fair value, honest sales and a decreased spread between the price he pays and the price the producer receives. Extension of rural electrification and cheap power are promised.

Coming to the plank on agriculture, the party congratulates itself on having "taken the farmer off the road to ruin" and promises that all available means will be used to raise farm income toward its pre-war purchasing power. How this is to be done is not stated in detail except that soil conservation and the domestic allotment program with payments to farmers are to be continued, as is the retirement of submarginal land. The plank continues:

"We favor the production of all the market will absorb, both at home and abroad, plus a reserve supply sufficient to insure fair prices to consumers; we favor judicious commodity loans on seasonal surpluses and we favor assistance within federal authority to enable farmers to adjust and balance production with demand, at a fair profit to the farmers."

Labor Gets Some Promises

Organized labor, through President William Green of the American Federation of Labor, had urged a number of suggestions upon the committee, but it had to be satisfied with rather vague promises that the worker would be protected and his rights, "both as wage earner and consumer, in the production and consumption of all commodities" would be guarded. Says the plank: "The worker has been returned to the road of freedom and prosperity. We will keep him on that road." The same statement is made concerning the American business man, and the American youth.

Monopolies are declared to be the creation of Republican rule and privilege, and the party pledges vigorous and fearless enforcement of the criminal and civil provisions of the existing anti-trust laws and the restoration of their efficacy where it has been weakened by "new corporate devices or judicial construction."

This led naturally to the matter of the constitution and the question of its amendment, which had been a subject of hot debate in the subcommittee's deliberations.

As to Constitutional Changes

The plank adopted is strikingly similar to Governor Landon's interpretation of the corresponding plank in the Republican platform. Detailing some of the problems that "cannot be adequately handled exclusively" by the states, it says:

"If these problems cannot be effectively solved by legislation within the Constitution, we shall seek such clarifying amendment as will assure to the legislatures of the several states and to the congress of the United States, each within its proper jurisdiction, the power to enact those laws which the state and federal legislatures, within their respective spheres, shall find necessary, in order adequately to regulate commerce, protect public health and safety and safeguard economic security. Thus we propose to maintain the letter and spirit of the Constitution."

The merit system is lightly touched upon with a promise to put all non-policy-making federal positions under the civil service law.

"Permanently Sound Currency"

Coming to "Government Finances," the platform approves "the objective of a permanently sound currency so stabilized as to prevent the former wide fluctuations in value." It asserts a determination to reduce the expenses of government and to achieve a balanced budget and reduction of the national debt at the earliest possible moment. Details of proposed methods are omitted. There is no mention of gold or silver.

The policy of the "Good Neighbor" is to be continued in foreign relations; war as an instrument of national policy is condemned, and the nation is to be kept out of any war which may develop anywhere. No mention is made of the League of Nations or the world court.

National Chairman James A. Farley, whose person, pictures and name were everywhere at the fore, opened the convention Tuesday with a well composed speech, after the delegates had been welcomed by Mayor Wilson. Mr. Farley's mention of Mr. Roosevelt's name precipitated the first demonstration; but the convention had not yet warmed up to enthusiasm.

By evening plenty of steam had been generated and it was first let loose for Governor Earle, who told at length and vigorously why he abandoned the Republican party in 1932 and was still a Democrat.

Keynoting by Barkley

Then came Senator Alben W. Barkley, stentorian orator from Kentucky, with his keynote speech, he having been selected as temporary chairman. He lost no time in setting forth the praiseworthy accomplishments of the New Deal and the sins of those who oppose it. His phrases were neatly turned and his style often elegant. Especially notable was the fact that the senator almost ignored Landon and Knox, directing most of his keen thrusts at Herbert Hoover and the American Liberty League. Denying any intention of attacking the Supreme Court, the orator yet expressed keen disappointment with its rulings that killed so many New Deal enterprises. "Is the Court beyond criticism?" he shouted rhetorically, and replied that Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt did not think so.

Senator Barkley gave the convention the kind of speech it wanted, and it was really a fine example of political oratory, sarcasm, satire, denunciation, pathos and argument being skilfully mingled. That he often left himself open to counter attack goes without saying, for every partisan speech is full of loopholes, but the Kentucky statesman added to his fame as an orator by this effort in Philadelphia.

As much cannot be said for Senator Joseph Robinson of Arkansas. Chosen as permanent chairman, he delivered his address as a delegate because the credentials committee had not reported and the radio broadcast time was at hand. The speech was carefully written but was too ponderous to be really effective. It repeated much that Senator Barkley already had said, and the delegates and guests became very restless. Senator Joe also scored Herbert Hoover mercilessly, and it became evident that the Democratic strategy was to picture the ex-President as still the actual leader of his party.

Other speakers had avoided President Roosevelt's alleged abandonment of the platform of 1932, but Senator Robinson had this to say:

"The Roosevelt administration has faithfully complied with the spirit of the Chicago platform promises. If there has been a partial departure from the letter of the planks in that platform relating to economy and balancing the budget, that failure is attributable to the constantly changing conditions and necessities and to the guerrilla warfare of the Republican party."

Wild Demonstration for F. D. R.

Friday's session was the culmination of the convention for at that time was renominated Franklin D. Roosevelt. The Auditorium was packed to its ultimate inch and the enthusiasm of the immense crowd was so tense as to be almost painful when Chairman Robinson recognized John E. Mack of New York. Four years ago Judge Mack put Mr. Roosevelt in nomination in Chicago, and the President had selected him to do the job again. He did it, and did it well. A finished speaker and sincere friend and admirer of the man he was serving, he had a grateful task. His glowing eulogies of the President repeatedly inspired the throng to wild bursts of cheering, and when he closed bedlam broke loose. If there had been some apathy in former sessions, there certainly was none now. The noise meter was at its top mark for long periods as the parading Democrats yelled and screamed and both band and organ played full blast. The demonstration reached the point of hysteria before the men and women sank wearied into their seats.

Action of the nomination revealed the fact, already suspected, that Franklin D. was the unanimous choice of the convention.

Renomination of John Nance Garner for the vice presidency was accomplished Saturday and was marked by an ovation for the well loved Texan second only to that which greeted the naming of Roosevelt. Then the convention adjourned sine die.

By this time President Roosevelt had arrived from Washington and in the evening he and Mr. Garner appeared in Franklin Field of the University of Pennsylvania before a crowd that filled that huge place and all the surrounding streets. There they delivered their speeches of acceptance, speeches that were carried by radio to millions and millions of listeners all over the broad land and even to foreign countries.

The demonstration for the President was tremendous. His countenance was wreathed in smiles, but there was deep emotion in his eyes and his voice as he addressed this part of the hosts he hopes confidently to lead to victory in November.

Do you know the State Department of Education has had its appropriations cut more than half since 1929-30?

Do you know all of the money spent by the State Department last year would have run the schools less than one day?

You might have noticed that people listen closer to the man who never talks much.

Perhaps the greatest compliment that can be paid a person is to say that he is just in all his views.

A man named Black witnessed a California traffic accident in which a car driven by Green struck a Mrs. Brown who was carried to a hospital by Mr. White. Some color scheme if you ask us.

"There is not so much danger in a known FOE as a SUSPECTED FRIEND."

Do you know five-sixths of the money education received from the state last year came from earmarked funds?

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON, Editor, Siluria, Ala.

This week we feel justified in beginning the Column with a word of congratulation for the fine report turned in by Robert Adams, who hap pens to be the Reporter for the Wilton Troop.

Robert has been writing the Wilton Troop Notes for some time now, and is a successor to Winston Hogan, who, we are proud to say, was at one time the Column's most active correspondent. Robert has been follow ing right along where Winston left off and has not failed to report a single time since he has become the reporter for the Wilton Scouts.

This week's report is one of the most interesting reports I have ever read. Following through with Robert he makts us feel that we were actually present when this group of happy Scouts made their trip to their new camp site. I feel that I took an active part in suggesting and selecting the chosen place.

After reading such an interesting report it should not be a hard matter for the other Scribes of the County to see what I mean when I say that we are all interested a great deal in what Scouts are doing in other sections of the County. It really is interesting to know what you are doing, and we would like, the best in the world, to know. So, come on fellows, and don't keep us waiting. Each week, in an imaginary way, we have been able to attend the meeting of the Wilton Scouts. As a result we feel that we know the entire troop that we are their personal friends. The one thing I look at in a big way is their Scoutmaster, Hoye Splawn. For a Troop to be what the Wilton Troop is, it is absolutely necessary that they have an interested leader.

Leaders that really know Scouting in connection with the interest that they possess are rather scarce in this particular County. I do not mean, by this, that we have men in our County who are not interested in Scouting. They are for Scouting in a big way. They just haven't taken time out to find out all the things about Scouting that are necessary for the proper leadership.

I don't know who the Wilton troop is sponsored by. It may be the School, Church or some Club, but regardless of which it may be, I would say that they have developed a troop that can be ranked with any othtr troop in Alabama.

Just to show you what hese fellows are really doing, I say, take it away Robert.

Wilton Troop Notes

The Wilton Scouts have had a very busy and enjoyable wetk. Sunday all the Scouts atsembled at the City Hall and took some pictures.

A special meeting was held Tuesday and plans were made for a camp. Log Cbin Beach, below Mitchell Dam on Coosa River was chosen at the spot.

Wednesday morning, wt left on the bus and arrived at the river about noon. After arranging all the equipment, everybody went swimming and fishing.

We visited Mitchtll Dam Thursday morning. It is a very large and interesting piace. It rained some while we were thert, but not enough to spoil our fun. We had to leave Friday morning about 9::00 o'clock.

Friday night at our regular meeting, Clay Lucas was appointed Scout Librarian and other business was dis cusstd.

Robert Adams, Troop Reporter.

Many a man who boasts of intelligence and culture is scared to death of a new idea.

Aid Asked For State Drouth Area Farmers

AUBURN—Federal aid for farmers in drouth-stricken areas of Alabama is being requested by Dr. L. N. Duncan, president of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute and director of the State Extension Service, and R. J. Goode State Commissioner of Agriculture.

In order to present official figures on the drouth damages in the State to Washington officials, the State agricultural leaders are this week making an extensive survey of the amount of loss incurred by destruction of and damage to crops resulting from prolonged drouth and high temperatures.

County farm and home demonstration agents throughout the State are cooperating in the efforts to obtain aid for drouth-ridden farmers. Meetings were held in Gadsden, Monday; Athens, Tuesday; and Jasper Thursday; and others are being planned to study the conditions and report to State and National farm leaders.

Commissioner Goode and his associates in Montgomery have sent questionaires to 2600 farmers through out the State asking for detailed information about damages to gardens pastures, corn, coton, vegebles, fruits and other crops. This information is expected to be complete by July 10.

So-called white-collar jobs are not what the man in overalls sometimes thinks they are.

CITIZENS MILITARY TRAINING CAMP

The Citizens Military Training Camp Procurement campaign will close on July 15th. Three boys from Shelby County have been accepted for camp. They are: James M. Black, Montevallo, Ala.; Perry Letson, Columbiana, Alabama; and Luther Franklin McGiboney, Columbiana.

There are still three vacancies to be filled in Shelby County. Should hesevacanciesnot be filled by July 15th, they will be transferred to other counties in this camp and from which applications have been received in excess of the county quota. Applications must be received in he office of the Camp Area Commander at Fort McClellan before July 16th.

The best help that one can get is self-help. Assistance from others is usually expensive.

Alabama Producers Plant Better Cotton

AUBURN—A total of 38,496 bushels of pure cotton seed directly from breeds were used in Alabama in some 30 counties to promote cotton improvement in 1936, according to preliminary reports from some 30 counties to J. C. Lowery, extension agronomist.

In addition these same counties used 75,749 bushels of good seed which had been saved at special gin days or otherwise cared for in ginning to prevent mixing but were one or more years from the breeder he reports.

"From all improved seed used in 1936, a supply of 3-4 to a million bushels of better planting seed can be saved if proper precautions are followed in ginning the cotton produced from the seed directly from the breeder.

"The cotton improvement program in Alabama is based on the one variety community plan or community farm organizations.

The Right To Criticize

AUGUSTUS J. COX

In the ordinary give and take of life there is a tremendous amount of free diagnosis, criticism and advice given—a great deal more given, in fact, than there is received.

It is less frequently received not because it is not true—it very often is—but rather because it does not grow out of a positive relationship between the people involved. There is one condition for gaining a hearing for advice, and that is identification of ones self with the person one is trying to help. It is only because that condition is so seldom met that it is easier to give advice than to persuade another to take it.

It is well for the Christian who is keen to introduce others to the new life, which comes from Christ, to remember that fact. Confidence comes before conviction in the winning of your friend. It may come almost immediately between two people, or it may require months and years to build up—but come it must, through positive, humble, patient self-identification. The other person must know that you have much in common with him, or on his level, having his best interest at heart. You may know that is true, but you must wait until he knows it. Otherwise your advice is premature; it will not only not be received, but may offend the other person to such an extent that he will avoid you in the future as he would any busybody. When en thusiastic, well-intentional personal work fails to bring people to Christ, more times than not, the reason is that the person doing it has jumped past confidence and is trying to produce conviction.

The same principle holds true in criticizing an institution, such as the church. If you want a hearing for your opinions of the work become a positive, working part of it, identified with its successes and its failures, helping it to function at its maximum because you love Christ and are a member of His body. That is not to pretend that it has no faults that is to win the right to correct those faults. If you do that, the Church will listen to your suggestions If you do not, it will disregard them, and rightly so.

One has to win the right to criticize. And when he does, there are no limits to the positive results which may be achieved, when two people, mutually identified, speak the truth to one another in love.

WILSONVILLE NEWS

July 5, 1936

The glorious old Fourth of July was, thank God, a very pleasant and enjobable day in our little town. The cleanest, most quiet Fourth for many years thank God. I believe in giving all the praise for all of our blessings, to God. Several family re unions, all happy occasions; but the one given by Mrs. John Hill and children was by far the sweetest and most enjoyed by me; because I was there and greatly enjoyed the day. Lots and lots of all kinds of good things for the physical man was enjoyed greatly; but by far the greatest joy was in the family social feast, meeting old friends of former days, especially the mother, and several of the children and grandchildren which carried me back to the happy days in the years gone by, when these children were all growing up; before the death of their good father, when this family was an unbroken happy family. Four of the seven children were there with three absent on account of sickness in their families. Mr. and Mrs. Noland Barnett and family of Columbiana, Mr. and Mrs. Onnie Hill and children of Lon Angeles, California, Mr. and Mrs. Leon Hill and family of St. Louis, Missouri and the youngest daughter, Miss Mamie Hill of Birmingham were present; and those absent were Mr. and Mrs. Johnnie Hill of Los Angeles, California, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hill of California and Mr. and Mrs. Offie Hill of Shelby County.

May this good family live long enough to celebrate many more home comings is the prayer of their old family physician.

Before closing please allow me the space to say: that I wish from the bottom of my heart that every family in Shelby County could have come out to the Methodist Church this morning and have heard our beloved pastor, Brother Mitchell's sermon to the parents, not only of Wilsonville, but to the entire universe. If he preaches a thousand years yet, he will never preach a truer or better sermon than the one this morning. His theme was "Home Building on the True Foundation of God's word."

We were glad to shake hands with Mr. and Mrs. Ode Lindsey, brother of our good friend, Byron Lindsey, and also Miss Irene Lindsey, his daughter, of Memphis, Teennessee.

Many thanks, Brother Editor, for your space in the paper and your valuable time taken.

Yours truly,
J. B. BOYER.

The Board of Revenue held a regular business meeting on Monday, at which time the County's warrants were promptly paid. We personally regret that some favorable action does not seem expedient to members of this Board whereby Shelby County could take advantage of the three-way road projects now being fostered by numerous Counties in the State. Permanent Highway construction is the surest, quickest way for progressive and permanent development of Shelby County. We had a personal chat with our good friend, Gaston Scott not so long ago, and he seemed especially enthusiastic over this progressive step forward for our County We hope it may yet be worked out in some profitably perfect plan. The whole County would benefit from this road project—and it does seem the propitious time to begin!

Poultry And Eggs Are Increasing

AUBURN — Sharp increases in poultry and egg production are revealed in a report by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

There were 12 per cent more chicks and young chickens of this years match in farm flocks on June 1 than there were on that date a year ago; and the production of eggs shows a 5 per cent increase.

Drouth Crisis Brings Federal Aid—Business Revival Continues in First Half of 1936—Steel Industry Fights Drive for Unionization.

FEARS that drouth may irritrievably destroy farm crops in North and South Dakota, eastern Montana and Wyoming prompted President Roosevelt to marshal $500,000,000 in relief funds to combat the damage and to develop further plans for fighting drouth.

Secretary Wallace

Secretary of Agriculture Henry W. Wallace, who left Washington for a personal survey of the stricken areas, declared that from all reports conditions had become as serious as they were in 1934, due to lack of sorely needed rains.

The secretary declared that unles rains descend in the sunscorched regions the government will buy 30,000,000 head of cattle in the next month.

In St. Paul, Minn., the governors of the five drouth-stricken northwestern states met with Federal Works Progress Administrator Harry L. Hopkins and administrators from the various states. Mr. Hopkins ordered relief jobs made immediately available for from 25,000 to 50,000 farmers who have seen their sole source of livelihood destroyed. The jobs were to be made available on water conservation projects, farm-to-market roads, rural schools and recreational projects.

President Roosevelt, in Washington, appointed a special committee composed of Secretary Wallace, Budget Director Daniel Bell, Aubrey Williams, Assistant Works Progress Administrator and Dr. Rexford G. Tugwell, resettlement administrator. They will work in cooperation with a committee of department of agriculture officials. The President instructed Budget Director Bell to study government appropriations to determine what funds are available.

CONTINUING business recovery during the first six months of 1936 fulfilled the hopes of optimistic prognosticators and surpassed the expectations of conservative forecasters.

All the leading trade barometers registered fair business weather at the close of the first half of the year. The production of automobiles reached 2,400,000 units in the first six months of 1936, the best for the period since 1929.

Improvement was further reflected by the steel industry, the operations of which rose from 49.2 per cent of capacity at the start of the year to 71.2 per cent at the end of June. The output of electricity climbed steadily to reach an all time peak in June.

The steady recovery of the railroads was indicated by carloadings which worked up to approach their best levels since 1931. The figures for the first six months of 1936 were substantially better than those for the similar period of 1935.

A strong upsurge of home building gave impetus to the construction industry although it still remained at subnormal levels.

AN INCREASE of 90 per cent in the cash farm income on cotton, wheat, tobacco, corn and hogs from 1932 to 1935 was recorded under the Agricultural Adjustment act, invalidated by the Supreme court last January, according to the annual report of Chester C. Davis, former administrator, made public in Washington.

Chester Davis

Cash farm income from these five major farm products which came under production control, rental and benefit payments was $1,365,000,000 in 1932, the year before the AAA became operative. For 1935 it was $2,593,000,000.

The report pointed out that cash farm income from all other products increased in the same period from $3,012,000,000 to $4,307,000,000.

Mr. Davis, who was recently appointed by President Roosevelt to the Federal Reserve board, declared that cash available for living expenses, taxes and interest from farm cash income was the highest in 1935 since 1929, and two and one-half times greater than it was in 1932.

DEFYING a drive to force unionization of its 500,000 workers, the steel industry in a strongly worded statement issued by the American Iron and Steel institute declared "it will oppose any attempt to compel its employees to join a union or pay tribute for the right to work."

Although the statement did not mention him by name, it was regarded by observers as the first official response to the recent announcement by John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, of a campaign to unionize steel employees.

In order to prevent the "closed shop," the industry said it "will use its resources to the best of its ability to protect its employees and their families from intimidation, coercion and violence and to aid them in maintaining collective bargaining free from interference from any source."

The unionization attempt comes at the time when steel operations have set a new record for 1936.

Reasserting its belief in the principles of collective bargaining, the industry's statement pointed out that employees now pick their own representatives for collective bargaining by secret ballot. The statement declares:

"The steel industry is recovering from six years of depression and huge losses and the employees are beginning to receive the benefit of increased operations. Any interruption of the forward movement will seriously injure the employees and their families and all business dependent upon the industry and will endanger the welfare of the country."

IN ESTES PARK, Colo., Gov. Alfred M. Landon, Republican Presidential nominee, continued his vacation begun with his family the week before and made plans for reconvening of the Kansas legislature and for the acceptance speech he will deliver in Topeka on July 23.

Gov. Landon

Although Governor Landon was resting preparatory to the rigors of the campaign, affairs of his state and conferences with political advisers occupied considerable of his attention.

When the Kansas legislature reconvenes a proposed amendment to the state constitution will be introduced, giving the state broad power to provide far-reaching legislation for social welfare and to co-operate with the federal government. Governor Landon was quoted as describing the proposed amendment as "satisfactory."

The amendment, which may be the basis for similar action in other states, reads:

"Nothing contained in this constitution shall be construed to limit the power of the legislature to enact laws providing for financial assistance to aid infirm or dependent persons; for the public health; unemployment compensation and general social security and providing for the payment thereof by tax or otherwise and to receive aid from the federal government therefor."

"YIELDING to the urgings of party leaders, Gov. Herbert H. Lehman of New York announced that he would run again for the office of governor. The governor had announced several months ago that he would not be a candidate again, giving as his reasons the press of personal business and a desire to retire to private life.

Democratic leaders declared the governor's decision will help the national ticket to carry New York in the election next November.

In a statement issued to newspapermen, Governor Lehman said he could "no longer resist" the appeals of national and state Democratic leaders. The statement said:

"Regardless of personal considerations, however compelling, I feel that I can no longer resist the pleas of my party both in the state and in the nation or of those with whom I have worked in closest association for many years and with whom I have waged the fight for equal opportunity and social security.

"Therefore if my party in this state chooses to nominate me again and if the people of the state again call on me for service I shall proudly accept the call and will devote myself wholeheartedly to the interest of the people of the state."

RETIRING from the post of Comptroller General, J. R. McCarl announced that following the expiration of his term of office he would aid in the government reorganization study undertaken by the senate committee headed by Senator Byrd of Virginia.

Gen. McCarl criticized New Deal emergency agencies as "loosely and extravagantly set up" and as "tax consuming in the extreme." He declared that a systematic reorganization of both regular and emergency agencies would improve government administration and reduce the cost to taxpayers.

PERSISTENCE of strikes in the provinces kept France in a state of unrest. A gain of 225,000 new members was reported by the general confederation of labor, organized labor's official body.

Altogether it was estimated that 100,000 workers were still absent from their jobs, in spite of reports of strike settlements in scattered sections throughout the country.

The French Riviera witnessed a general exodus of foreign tourists from 450 hotels and resorts following a lockout by the proprietors. The hotels were closed indefinitely after the employers declared they could not meet workers' demands for more pay and shorter hours. This retaliation by the owners against the threat of a workers' strike upset the summer tourist season, one of the most profitable to the French.

Government representatives were busy attempting to settle three serious strikes—iron and steel workers in the Lorraine region, naval shipyard workers at St. Nazaire and employees on the pari-mutuel machines at Parisian race tracks.

WHILE representatives of leading powers gathered in Geneva to lift League of Nations economic sanctions against Italy and the refugee emperor, Haile Selassie, of Ethiopia prepared to plead the cause of his nation's freedom, European statesmen considered the possibility of a reorganization and reformation of the League.

Haile Selassie

Observers agreed that while informal discussions on the League reformation would be held, it was probable that the question of reorganizing the international pact body would be postponed until the September assembly.

DESPITE his previous decision declaring unconstitutional the tax on railroads to permit pensions, Justice Jennings Bailey of the District of Columbia Supreme Court ruled in an oral opinion that the railroad retirement board could pay pensions to railroad workers.

The justice declared that his previous decision on the validity of the rail pension laws could not be construed to mean that the retirement act itself was unconstitutional. He ruled that the government could proceed to collect from rail workers a sum amounting to 3 1-2 per cent of their salaries and could use the money to pay retirement pensions to the workers when they reach 65 years of age or have worked 40 years.

He also ruled that the railroad retirement board could proceed to collect information on which to allot the pensions, provided it did so at its own expense and by recompensing the railroads for any clerical work involved.

Justice Bailey's original decision in the case had specifically enjoined the railroad retirement board from taking any steps to compel the railroads to furnish information. The decision ruled that the tax law adopted to finance the pensions was unconstitutional and ruled that the tax measure and retirement measure setting up means of paying the pensions were "inseparable."

BRECKINRIDGE LONG, American ambassador to Italy, submitted his resignation to President Roosevelt because of illness. The diplomat declared that he hopes to recuperate his health during the summer and to take an active part in the Presidential campaign in the autumn.

Mr. Long's place will be taken by Undersecretary of State William Phillips. He will represent the United States government in Rome in an effort to solve Italo-American problems arising from Mussolini's conquest of Ethiopia.

Mr. Phillips has had a distinguished career in the diplomatic service. He has held posts in Europe, the Far East and Canada and has three times been sub-secretary in the State department.

The most pressing problem facing Mr. Phillips in his new post is the regularizing of America's relations with Ethiopia, now claimed by Italy as a territory, but still recognized by this country as independent. The importance of this question, observers declare, is indicated by the selection of Mr. Phillips for the Italian post. Only on rare occasions in the past have active sub-cabinet officers been given diplomatic posts.

FLOODS which followed a series of cloudbursts in south Texas caused property damage estimated at millions of dollars and cost the lives of 22 people.

Rains which fell at the rate of nine to ten inches a minute swelled the creeks and rivers of the afflicted areas into wild floods. It was reported that thousands of acres of farm land in Gonzales and adjoining counties were inundated.

As the flood waters receded they revealed a grave picture of destruction. The flood ripped through the settlement of Kyle, between Austin and San Antonio, washing out bridges and wrecking a train. It was here that the loss of life was greatest.

In the Guadalupe Valley it was estimated that 300,000 acres of farm lands been inundated. Although the waters subsided rapidly, the flood had wiped out the corn and cotton crops.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

Washington—"Edging a little further to the left," the advice given by Democratic National Committeeman Joseph Wolf of Minnesota to Roosevelt leaders to offset the defections caused by the bolting of conservative Democrats, is not so significant so far as the administration policies—assuming Roosevelt is re-elected—are concerned. Roosevelt will continue his own sweet way whether his "mandate" to do so comes by a big majority or is of the "skin of his teeth" variety. He will be no more disturbed in his course than was Woodrow Wilson when the expected mandate of 1918 resulted in a popular rebuke.

What is really important is that Wolf, a very astute observer of trends in the Northwest, is distinctly disturbed over the Lemke-Father Coughlin-Townsend third party ticket. He is frankly afraid, and so told leaders of the New Deal, that the net result might be to throw Minnesota to Gov. Alf M. Landon.

Most unprejudiced political observers have been figuring for some weeks now that South Dakota, Iowa and Nebraska, as well as Kansas, were leaning Republican. All of which would do Landon no good unless he holds all the big eastern states. But they had been virtually unanimous in conceding North Dakota and Minnesota, and of course Montana, to Roosevelt.

In short, most observers had come to the conclusion that Landon could be elected if—he could carry New York and Illinois. That goes for Indiana also, and Ohio. But opinion has been that if the tide for Roosevelt should turn in Illinois, Indiana would be for the Kansas Coolidge by the same token, while Ohio seems set to go Republican regardless of what its neighbors may do.

Experts Are Wrong

Putting Minnesota in the balance does not change the essential elements of the election battle. It keeps it from being as one-sided as the fight experts thought the Joe Louis-Schmeling battle was going to be.

And the political experts have not been as wrong for 20 years—since Wilson beat Hughes in 1916—as the sporting experts were on the big fistic battle.

And they are not going to be as wrong as that this year, for one very simple reason. Ever since that election when the big eastern newspapers were chagrined at claiming Hughes' election on the early returns, the big eastern editors have realized that the western states had electoral votes also. So they have sent their own political reporters on tours of inquiry, so they would know what to expect on election night.

As of the present moment, New York is vital to the Republicans—is not vital so far as the Democrats are concerned, but would end all doubt. The same goes for Massachusetts, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

Recent developments have changed the situation in a number of states, notably Maryland, West Virginia, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, North and South Dakota and Minnesota. The Mormon church action on relief has given Utah a Republican instead of a Democratic tinge, and has moved Idaho from the sure Roosevelt to the doubtful column.

The whole point is that, while a Roosevelt landslide is still possible, evidence now points to a close election, with Roosevelt still the favorite, but in decided danger.

Slightly Sour Note

One slightly sour note in the Democratic platform situation is not being talked about—openly. It concerns one of President Roosevelt's fundamental policies, and is wrapped up in the tax bill just passed by congress. The fact that 18 Democratic senators voted against the final bill, that two more were paired against it, and that a twenty-first, Sen. Marcus A. Coolidge of Massachusetts, was absent and unpaired but is nevertheless against the bill, is rather interesting in view of the fact that the platform endorses everything Roosevelt stands for.

All of which is important because of the reasons actuating these 21 Democratic senators. The final draft of the tax bill means a great deal more than just a tax measure. It works toward some of the dearest objectives of the Roosevelt policy. It is a natural sequence to his acceptance speech at the convention four years ago. On that occasion he made his views about "piled up surpluses" of corporations rather clear. This tax bill, following up the one of last year, but going a great deal further, is in line with that policy.

Roosevelt wants to go still further. He will go still further along this line, if it is humanly possible, assuming he is re-elected. So the fact that 21 senators of his own party are against that policy is of more than a little interest.

Very little will be heard of it from Democrats from now on. Republican orators will call attention to it, in such quarters as they think it will help their cause to do so.

Expect Close House

The most interesting angle politically lies in the future. Unless there should be some tidal wave not really expected even by James A. Farley down in his heart, the next house of representatives will be fairly close. It may be Democratic and it may be Republican, but the best guess at the moment is that the majority will not be more than 50 if it is Democratic, or 20 if it is Republican.

With a close house, such a difference of opinion within a party as was manifested in the senate vote on the tax bill will become of overwhelming importance of every vital allied issue. It would seem to mean that while the critics of the present tax plan would not be able to force its repeal, they would be able to prevent any further moves toward the Roosevelt objective.

On the other hand, there is not the slightest sign that Roosevelt will lose his grip on the senate. On the contrary, the vote on the tax bill represented pretty nearly the high-water mark of his opponents. On few issues could such a number of Democratic dissenters be raised.

Reverse Policy

Complete reversal of the normal "sock the taxpayer" policy of the internal revenue bureau, the policy established under Robert H. Jackson of never compromising, forcing little taxpayers to pay lawyer fees and endure court trials even when all the precedents favor the taxpayers' side, is seen in the quashing of indictments against lieutenants of the late Huey P. (Kingfish) Long in Louisiana.

The strongest pro-administration paper within a hundred miles of Washington, if indeed there is any stronger anywhere in the country, the Washington News, carried a biting editorial under the heading, "It Smells Bad."

Editors of the News suspected what might underly the affair, which had Attorney General Homer S. Cummings squirming in a recent press conference, but they apparently overlooked a fairly important detail. This is that the former Long lieutenants, now enthusiastic for the New Deal, arranged a special train to run over to Dallas to meet President Roosevelt on his recent trip to the Texas Tercentennial, there to demonstrate their undying loyalty.

The News editorial concluded: "When he quashed the indictments, U. S. Attorney Viosca gave the explanation that there was a 'changed atmosphere' in New Orleans. Better continue to hold your nose until Attorney General Cummings gives a more deodorizing explanation."

Mr. Cummings' defense was that he had complete confidence in the integrity of U. S. Attorney Viosca!

All of which is the sequel to a most interesting political yarn, rivaling that about how the gangster chieftain Capone, suspected of every crime on the calendar, was finally put behind the bars on income tax evasion charges.

Recent History

The point is that back some months before Huey Long was assassinated, there was very grave fear on the part of the New Deal leaders that he might lead a third party movement which might throw the electoral votes of Louisiana, and perhaps some other states (with the aid of Father Coughlin and the Townsend plan advocates) away from Roosevelt.

It was at this time that the internal revenue sleuths began looking into the income tax returns of Huey himself as well as some of his lieutenants.

At this stage Dan Moody, former governor of Texas, was called into the picture. He had made his reputation and been elected governor of Texas on the strength of his prosecution of graft in road contracts in the Lone Star state. He was called to Washington, conferred with high officials of the Department of Justice, and convinced by them that there was a sure-fire case. Amos Woodcock of Maryland, former prohibition director, was also called in and persuaded the government could convict.

The whole idea, of course, was to eliminate Huey Long and all his lieutenants by the simple expedient of putting them behind the bars. The processes were set in motion, and eventually one of the lieutenants was actually convicted.

But then Long died, and his lieutenants, after some little delay, made their peace with Washington. Those not worried about the prospect of income tax prosecutions were interested in other questions. Party regularity, perhaps, and the good patronage jobs at the disposal of James A. Farley, Harold L. Ickes, and Harry L. Hopkins.

Whatever the reason, they all became good New Dealers, and the Father Coughlin and Townsend enthusiasts found no encouragement in Louisiana for their party ideas. Which was just as good from the political standpoint here as though they had all been put in jail. A little better, in fact, for there was no danger of making martyrs of them.

SYNOPSIS

Jeb Braddon, young and fantastically successful broker of Chicago, is infatuated with Agnes Gleneith, beautiful daughter of a retired manufacturer. Rodney, a doctor, in love with Agnes, visits his brother, Jeb. Rod plans work at Rochester. Jeb suggests that he make a try for Agnes before leaving. In Rod there is a deeper, obstinate decency than in Jeb. Agnes believes to be happy, a girl must bind herself entirely to a man and have adorable babies. Rod visits Agnes and tells her of his great desire, but realizes it can never be fulfilled. Agnes' mother is attempting to regain her husband's love. Agnes has disturbing doubts as to what attracts her father in New York. Jeb tells Agnes he is going to marry her.

He laughed in his honest way. "Two months that I distinctly remember. Vaguely before that—exactly how long vaguely, I don't know. D'you care?"

"Have you always done that?"

"Spotted buildings for a start with some one? Yes; I guess I have. But I've never brought a girl to her building before."

The building was a tall, new apartment structure of splendid spread and height, with an agent in the ground-floor offices only too glad to show them through.

Of course some one might enter and recognize them; some acquaintance might step into the elevator which lifted them from floor to floor. That made it more exciting; yet it was disturbing enough to step into an empty apartment, and having inspected the front rooms, follow a pattering little spectacled man into another chamber, and have him turn to Jeb and you and say: "If you like separate rooms, here are two perfect ones with a bath between. On the other hand, if you prefer the same room, this is beautifully adequate for twin beds, and of course for a double."

This was more than last night. Oh, this was much more! To think upon things definitely, to look upon life here with Jeb.

He sent the little chattering Mr. Colver pattering off on an errand, and in this room so beautifully adequate for "them," Jeb swung her up in his arms.

"Let's make it soon, Glen; not wait! Why should we wait? We'll marry with a wedding, as we ought to do. At church, and a reception at the house; but all that need be only a month away. Your ring's being made; I'll have it tomorrow. Today, I'll lease this place; we'll furnish it together."

She was trembling in his arms.

"You want to, Glen!"

"Yes; I want to!"

"All right, then!"

"No! Not all right! I can't say it, Jeb! Oh, I wish I could!"

"Then for God's sake, why can't you?"

For at that moment he did not doubt himself at all. Some day this overwhelming want, this desire, might die as he must die—some day. But he was all lover now.

"I can't."

Other sounds returned to them: the blare of radio so loud that it was audible from below, even through these solid and sound-deadened floors.

Agnes thought: "Some child downstairs is doing that."

Mr. Colver was returning, and before he re-entered the room, Jeb dropped her feet to the floor and released her.

"I might show you how this arrangement looks when furnished," Mr. Colver offered.

"That's a good idea," said Jeb. "You'll look, won't you?" He turned it upon Agnes. "I'd like to, too," he said, for the agent's benefit, "but I ought to be back at my office. But you'll look further."

"Yes," said Agnes, "I'll look." For she realized that, by agreeing, she was lessening his chagrin.

It was astonishing afterward to look back and consider that this crack in his character—this moment's pique to his pride and her response to it—could so profoundly affect the rest of her life. Except for it, she would have left the building with him. As it was, the three of them got into the elevator together; Agnes and Mr. Colver got out on the next floor; Jeb descended to the street.

The radio, which Agnes had heard when in the empty apartment above, was roaring from within the door before her. Evidently it had a large and powerful amplifier which must have been turned on full. It was impossible to ignore the noise.

"Mrs. Lorrie," said Colver, raising his voice to be heard, "must have had the radio tuned to some quiet program and forgotten it and gone out. Then this came on."

Colver tapped on the door, evoking no response. He rapped louder.

"Don't come in!" a girl's voice screamed. "Don't come in!" And its timbre of terror shrilled through the door, while the radio uproar continued. "For God's sake, come in! Come in!" the girl now was shrieking.

Little Mr. Colver went pale as Agnes stared at him. "That's Mrs. Lorrie," he was saying. "She's very young." And he tried to turn the knob of the door.

"For God's sake, come in!"

"Mrs. Lorrie! I can't!" Mr. Colver managed to shout. Then Agnes heard the knob turned from the inside, and the door swung in, a girl holding with both hands to the knob and supporting herself upon it.

"Who're you?" She glared at Agnes. Suddenly the terror in her eyes turned to awful, imploring relief, and she thrust the door away from her and seized Agnes, clamoring to her: "Oh, God, I'm glad to see you—glad to see you!"

"Mrs. Lorrie!" the little agent was mouthing. "Why, Mrs.—Mrs. Lorrie!"

It was Colver who must have closed the door; at any rate, it was closed behind them, and the three were within the apartment. All the time, the radio sustained its roar. At last, Colver went to the cabinet and shut it off and the silence re-echoed.

The girl called Mrs. Lorrie never for an instant relaxed her hold on Agnes. She dragged Agnes down beside her in a big overstuffed chair which had a litter of cigarettes about it.

"What's happened?" Agnes implored. "Oh, what has happened?"

"Nothing's happened!" the girl declared. "Oh, I'm in a hell of a mess!"

She was soft and moist and warm where her body pressed against Agnes. But her hands were cold and moist in her clamoring terror. There was gin on her breath, but she was not drunk. That was not the trouble with her.

A heavy, sensuous perfume overpowered the gin; it seemed to be all over her, especially in her short mane of hennaed hair. She had arched, plucked eyebrows, and mascaraed lashes, and skin splotched with rouge which perspiration had streaked; her wet lips had distorted the crimson smears of lipstick. She was slim but plump-bosomed, and she was in negligee — lacy, fussy underwear and sheer stockings under her lace and pink-silk peignoir.

Her neck and shoulders and arms and her legs curled under her were slender and dainty. She would be pretty, Agnes realized, if she were not in such a state; and she was no older than Agnes herself.

"Mrs. Lorrie, what's the matter?" the little agent Colver begged of her. "Can't you tell me what's the matter, Mrs. Lorrie?"

"Don't go down there!" Mrs. Lorrie cried.

"I'll look for something — salts," Mr. Colver said, and he started toward the bedrooms — whereat the girl screamed, and Colver stopped.

"Go on!" called Agnes. "See what happened!"

The girl pushed back from her and leaped to her feet, but then she did not move; she stood swaying slightly as she stared toward the bedrooms, where the little agent had disappeared.

She Stood Swaying Slightly as She Stared Toward the Bedrooms.

"Oh!" she heard, and Agnes heard. Colver's cry. "Mr. Lorrie! Mr. Lorrie!"

Then there was nothing they could hear clearly till Colver came back.

He was so scared that he looked silly.

"You know what we walked in on? A killing—a killing," he rambled at Agnes almost as if Mrs. Lorrie was not there. "He's dead back there—the blood on the floor!"

"Who?" Agnes managed.

"Her husband—Mr. Lorrie—he rented this apartment from me! He's on the floor in there—with holes shot in him. She shot him! That's what we come in on!"

The girl continued to sway. She had shut her eyes and opened them and shut them. "You don't know a damn thing what I did! What he did, what I did! You don't know a damn thing!" she cast back, with her eyes shut. Then she fell forward, and Agnes caught her.

Pressed down in the huge soft chair by the weight of the girl, Agnes did not move; and the warm, limp form she held was motionless. She held her in her arms and stared over her at the sun slanting in through the south windows; and Agnes recollected that thus the sun was slanting in upstairs in the empty room, the duplicate of this, which she had examined with Jeb—how long ago? Ten minutes ago?

Here, in this apartment, had husband and wife lived together? This wife in her arms, and the husband on the floor in there with holes shot in him.

The wife—she was a widow now; and was she also a murderer—lay limp across Agnes and the soft overstuffed arms of the chair; she lay on her breast, her head hanging down. Agnes roused to an effort and turned her over.

"What you want?" the girl complained as if from sleep.

Agnes shook her. "Did you do it?"

"Maybe I did."

But again Agnes shook her.

"Wha' you want?"

"When was it? What time did you do it?"

"Two o'clock. The damn clock was striking when I come out here."

Two! Now, by the ticking, gold-faced clock on the mantel, it was a quarter past three.

"You sat here all the time?"

"Sure I sat here." And this recollection now roused her to pity for herself. "All alone. All alone!"

Suddenly, startlingly, a phone bell rang.

The arms about Agnes clenched tighter and then let go. The girl pushed back and leaped up and scurried to the instrument on the stand in the corner. "Hello! Hello!" Then she heard a voice, and she dropped to one knee as she made response, whispering; but in the stillness of the room her voice came clear. "Oh, God, Bert!" she said; and she listened again.

She wanted to speak, but she stared at them and did not.

"Bert," she repeated the name, "something's happened. . . . Yes; to Charley! He died today." And she slammed down the phone on its rest.

Now Colver seized the phone.

"Operator?" he clamored. "Operator? Give me the police!"

Halfway from the phone, the girl, Mrs. Lorrie, had stopped and turned, but she made no interference at all; she merely listened to him call the police.

Agnes had risen from the great soft chair, and the girl seized her hand. "Now you help me," Mrs. Lorrie demanded. "Get me a lawyer. I've a right to a lawyer, the best damn lawyer in this town. You don't know what happened here — or anything! Get me that lawyer!"

"What lawyer?" said Agnes.

"O'Mara. Martin O'Mara; that's his name. Oh, do that for me, won't you? Just get him on the wire; and I'll talk to him."

She was back at the telephone and fumbling at the pages of the directory so pitifully that Agnes took the book from her hand and found the name Martin O'Mara; and then she made the call.

First a woman's voice answered; then a man's said: "O'Mara."

"Here he is," said Agnes, but the girl had slumped to the floor.

"I am calling," said Agnes into the phone, "I am calling from an apartment where a man has been killed."

"All right," said the voice O'Mara. "Go on. What apartment? Where is it?"

Agnes told him. "I do not know the people," she proceeded. "Only their name. It's Lorrie. I just happened in. I am here with Mrs. Lorrie now."

"All right. Go on. Who's killed?"

"Her husband."

"How was he killed?"

"She shot him."

"All right. Go on. Who are you?"

"I'm Agnes Gleneith."

"Related to Robert C. Gleneith?"

"He's my father."

"Did you say you didn't know the Lorries?"

"I didn't."

"All right. Go on. Then how did you happen in?"

"I was with the agent. I was looking at another apartment in the building."

"All right. Have the police been called?"

"Just now, they were."

"All right. Now try to remember this: Tell Mrs. Lorrie I am coming at once. Tell her to talk to no one, not to any one,—not even to you, until I get there. Especially and absolutely she is not to talk to the police. Tell her they cannot make her talk. No one can; no one has a right to. Tell her to stay there and not to try to go away, and not to let any one take her away.

"And you must stay there too; and you had better not talk till I get there. You are going to be a witness in this case; you cannot possibly escape it. I am very sorry for you, but there is now nothing that I or any one can do about it. I will be there as soon as I can."

Agnes put down the phone. No man had ever sought, by his voice, to rule her so. She felt, as she faced about, that she ought to resent it; but she did not. She felt herself, instead, depending upon it — upon the assurance and domination of that man (a voice and a name O'Mara) who was on his way to her.

The girl on the floor had sat up. "You got him for me?"

"Yes," said Agnes, "I got him. He's coming now."

Little Mr. Colver was at a window. "Here's the police," he said. "A—a homicide squad, I suppose."

"You're not to talk to them," Agnes said to Mrs. Lorrie. "You're not to say a word to any one. They have no right to make you. You're not to say a word about anything till Mr. O'Mara gets here."

A King's Farewell
Good Soldier Obeys
An If or Two
40,000,000 Degrees

Paris.—To "last words of dying men" will be added those of the late King George of England—"I am sorry to keep you waiting like this." Typical of a good, modest king, always obedient to duty.

Arthur Brisbane

At the request of his ministers, including Sir John Simon, who waited upon him at the last moment, the king struggled pathetically to sign his name to a state paper, succeeded, then, turning to his advisers, spoke those last words, followed by a smile and nod with which he was accustomed to end an audience.

This was published in the Star of Johannesburg, South Africa, in a Reuter dispatch. Mr. Gunia sends the clipping from Gibsonia, Pa. Much obliged.

The Italian soldier Badoglio, in the striking uniform of an Italian marshal, returned to Rome and embraced Mussolini, who wore the uniform of a corporal of fascist militia. Napoleon also liked to be called the "little corporal."

Marshal Badoglio is an Italian soldier who obeys orders. When Mussolini's forces were marching on Rome, Badoglio, according to the story, said to the king: "What shall I do—wipe them out?" The king ordered: "No; no violence." Now, Mussolini rules, and on his orders Badoglio wipes out Haile Selassie and the government of Ethiopia.

Anything could happen in Europe, and one of the things considered quite possible, extremely disturbing to respectable old England and others, is an agreement between Mussolini and Hitler to make "a deal on Austria" profitable for both; not for Austria.

There is always, however, the memory of 1914, when Austria, Italy and the Kaiser had the triple alliance that did not "stand up." Such alliances usually go along racial lines, if they are to last. France and Italy are natural allies, both Latin; England and the United States would probably be found not far apart if a really big World war should ever come, with one or two other IFS.

Science proudly demonstrates for the Westinghouse company a new lamp that "rivals the beams of the sun." The demonstrator explained that the temperature at the sun's surface is about 11,732 degrees Fahrenheit, while the new lamp reaches 25,232 degrees Fahrenheit. That, however, as scientists know, is a long way from the sun's best temperature.

According to Sir James Jeans, there prevails in the depths of the sun temperature of "forty million degrees centigrade," which is considerably higher than any man-made temperature.

If you came within 1,000 miles of a 5 cent piece with a temperature of 40,000,000 degrees centigrade, you would be burned to a cinder; hard to believe, but true.

England protested against raising the elevation of guns on American warships because that would make our guns shoot too far. In case of war we might hit a British ship lined up against us.

Are animals capable of any thought?

A dog on Prince Edward island, whining and howling with its muzzle against a pile of clothing on the edge of a pool, attracted men who took from the water the bodies of two brothers, fifteen and seventeen years old. Could the dog have "thought out" a connection between the clothing and the disappearance of its young owners?

At Ur, ancient city of the Chaldeans, they show a gigantic brick temple, recently uncovered, where it has lain in the ground covered through the ages. It was constructed originally, like the tower of Babel, to enable the builders to get up into heaven and reach the gods. First they invented those pagan gods, and then they actually believed in them.

The United States navy has ordered 191 "bomber" airplanes; cheerful small news.

It is to be hoped that the government is trying to build bomber planes able to fly any ocean.

If war came, our bombing operations could be carried on in countries across the Atlantic or the Pacific. We should not want to do any bombing in America. After the first experiment, no country would send any ships within easy bombing or submarine range of these shores.

Final rites were held for State Senator Shelby Sidney Fletcher, 61, lawmaker and leading Huntsville business man, who died June 27 of a heart attack.

IN THE SOUTH

"Somehow, here the moon is pearer
Warmer, brighter. Stars are clearer
Days of Summer linger longer:
Laughs are gayer: love is stronger:
Sea is bluer: clouds are whiter:
Music lilts to rhythms lighter:
Mountainsides and valleys greener:
Ocean breezes, fresher, cleaner:
Fruits have richer, sweeter flavor:
Zest of life has keener savor.

Somehow welcomes here are truer:
Every morning sun is newer:
Every sunset blazes brighter:
Sorrow's weary burden slighter:
People play with more abandon:
Feet seem made to dance . . . . not stand on,
Really, these are facts I'm giving.
Life down here seems more like living."

And with this timely tribute to the South, we begin a verbal ramble about folk whom you and I know in one of the loveliest little cities in the Southland C-O-L-U-M-B-I-A-N-A

COLUMBIANA CHATTER

Have you heard about the three little Columbiana Maids who went swimming down Mississippi way attired in one of those new flesh colored, form fitting bathing suits—the envy of all the mermaids in the sea? Who were they?—Well, we shall call them "September Morn", 'Sally Rand' and "Aphrodite." If you want to know WHO they really are—we shall have to tell you "CONFIDENTIALLY." It's an "on the beach secret." The murmuring sea waves whispered to us.

We were formally presented on the 4th of July—that red letter day on our calendar, to Marion Louise Davidson, three weeks old beauteous bit of femininity and recent "blessed event" in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Joe Davidson of Helena. Everybody will remember Marion Louise's talented Mother—Emmie Pitts—and if we are not badly mistaken, our recollection serves us correct in stating that we have never seen "Emmie" when she was not "talking", "laughing" or demanding in no uncertain tones what she wanted, and getting it. Marion Louise is a "chip off the old block" and the prettiest "little shaver" we have seen in many moons.

Handsome as a picture is John Marshall Crutcher, three year old grand son of the popular Methodist Pastor, Henry M. Hurst. Both distinguished gentlemen brightened the office on Independence Day for those of us on duty with a thoughtful call. Little Mr. Crutcher hails from Athens, Alabama, and has personality, plus a mind of his own! We think he could make a fortune by submitting his picture to Saturday Evening Post for a cover design. So, we pass the idea along to his parents for further consideration.

Wilburn Riley, former graduate of Shelby County High School, now making good in the field of education, visited friends and relatives in Columbiana on Sunday. Mr. Riley holds a responsible teaching position in Scottsboro.

We were delighted to hear that Frank Allen, home town boy, now residing in Clay County, had won the Democratic nomination for the office of County Superintendent of Education for Clay County. Winning by only eleven votes over his opponent in the recent Election, a contest was filed, but with one of the best attorneys in the South, L. H. Ellis, of Columbiana, representing one of the most enthusiastic and progressive Educators we know about—well, there was not a chance for young Mr. Allen to miss his ambitious goal. We send across the miles to this former resident of Columbiana our heartiest congratulations. (We knew you COULD do it Frank—— when you were in High School—if and when you ever decided to settle down.)

Woods Cooper, of Sylacauga, spent Sunday in Columbiana with his brother, Dr. E. B. Cooper.

Mrs. Clara Scott, gracious and charming matron from Greenville, Alabama, who is always assured of a cordial welcome from her many friends in Columbiana, is the guest of her sister, Mrs. D. S. Lightcap. Many delightful courtesies are being planned in her honor during her visit here.

The best looking attorney in Shelby County—(Sure, you guessed it—Karl Harrison) is mixing business with pleasure this week, as he pays homage to one of the most attractive blonde beauties we have seen—Miss Mildred Bennett, of Savannah, Georgia, the attractive house guest of Mr. and Mrs. Ed Lovelady. This is one "case" we have heard no plea for a continuance on the part of this popular attorney, nor even one little "negative-demurrer"—and since we have had the privilege of a vis a vis chat with the lady in question—we heartily approve the aforementioned Disciple of Blackstone falling in line with the rest of the "gentlemen who prefer blondes." Miss Bennett is one of the best reasons for this truism we have met.

Mr. and Mrs. Felton Goodwin of Birmingham, were the week end guests of their parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Goodwin.

The many friends of Dr. Joel Chandler, will be glad to learn that he is convalescing in a hospital in Birmingham, following a serious operation last week.

Mr. and Mrs. William W. Teague of Kingsport, Tenn., are spending their vacation with Mrs. Rosa Teague

Miss Lanace Curlee of Birmingham is visiting friends in Columbiana

Miss Katherine Ewing of Birmingham is the attractive guest of Miss Jane Fowler.

Mrs. Clayton McGhee and son, John Charles, have returned home after spending several weeks in Alexander City.

Judge Stokely of Birmingham was a distinguished visitor in Columbiana on Saturday. We gratefully acknowledge a personal call from this friend of ours, high in the hierarchy of the legal profession, but one who never fails to say, and do, just the correct thing, to bring a bit of happiness, to those with whom he is associated, which lovable trait, probably accounts for his popularity in the Magic City as well as in Shelby County.

Miss Doris Luttrell of Atlanta, is the guest of Miss Ruth Luck.

Misses Dorothy Cason and Dorothy Galloway have returned to their homes in Birmingham and Pineville, Kentucky, respectively, after several days visit with Misses Idell and Odell Turner.

Miss Frances Walker, lovely daughter of Probate Judge and Mrs. Len C. Walker, is spending the summer on a European tour. Miss Walker will return to the States in time to re-enter Randolph Macon College in September where she is one of the most popular and talented members of the College set.

Mr. and Mrs. A. E. (Bud and Lady Bud) Norwood left Calera on Tuesday for an extended tour of Florida, including a trip to Gainesville, where they will be the guests of their son, Clarence Bray, who is playing professional baseball during the summer with the Florida League. The Norwoods will then visit St. Augustine and Daytona Beach, Miami and other points before returning home.

Camping on Blue Creek for the past week end furnished the diversion for a coterie of popular visitors who have made many friends during their stay in Columbiana. Misses Dorothy Cason and Dorothy Galloway, the guests of Misses Odell and Idell Turner. Those included in this charming bit of hospitality were: Misses Dorothy Cason, Dorothy Galloway, Vivian, Odell and Idell Turner and Messrs. B. J. Baldwin, "Hoot" Jacks and G. R. McNeill of Birmingham and Powell Blair of Columbiana.

Miss Irene Carlisle, of Wedowee, who is taking a special course at Montevallo, spent the past week end with Mrs. Pollye Lyon and Mrs. Adell Stinson.

Have you seen the adorable Terree Nall Cox in her newest summer attire? Terree is the friendliest and happiest little Miss who has ever visite dthis office, and her four months sojourn in his old topsy turvy world seems, so far, to have been without a cloud in her sky. Here's hoping that future years hold everything gloriously bright and fair for the "sweetest little fellow" of whom we are especially fond.

And speaking of these "up and coming" Americanos—our little three month old neighbor friend, known as Dizzy Dean—is growing sweeter and cuter each day he lives. Frequently after a hard day's grind in this office, this roly-poly youngster comes over for a little twilight visit, while his pretty little mater gets his dinner ready to serve—and whether you believe it or not "Dizzy" knows when he gets hungry—and when he gets thru telling you about it—there is not a doubt left among his hearers. My favorite "manikin!" He is a wonderfully happy youngster and cries only when necessary to get what he wants! And does he get it—or DOES he get it!

Alvin Lefkovits, formerly of Columbiana, son of Mr. and Mrs. Max Lefkovits, who is now holding one of the most responsible positions with a large Department Store in Chattanooga, Tennessee, spent his vacation last week visiting his parents in Columbiana.

Mrs. Barbara Goldberg of Selma, is visiting her sister, Mrs. Max Lefkovits.

Frank Fulton entertained a few of his friends on Sunday night with a steak fry at his picturesque "Cabin in the Hills." Among those included in this popular host's invited guests were: Misses Sesson, Beth Wallace, Dorothy Cason Messrs Gerald Fulton and Douglas Holman.

The many, many friends of Earl Wood are delighted to have the privilege of welcoming him back into Columbiana this week after a sojourn of several weeks in a hospital in Birmingham.

Miss Agnes Wingard, one of the important "spokes" in the Educational Wheel which revolves so successfully under J. L. Appleton's supervision, has left Columbiana for a well earned vacation. Miss Wingard will be the guest of Mamie Jo Harbin in Athens for a week ,and from Athens she will motor to Decatur, Hunstville Muscle Shoals and other points before her return to Columbiana. Miss Wingard's work in Shelby County as Secretary, for a number of years in the County Superintendent's office has been outstanding. Miss Wingard is well known and liked throughout the entire territory she so efficiently serves.

We started the day off "just right" on Tuesday morning. An iced coca-cola with an old friend whom everybody is always glad to see in Columbiana, Clay Lester—a walking "Santa Claus" to everybody he meets on little Old Main. If you don't believe me—ask Rev. Hurst who passed by puffing a Hava-Tampa and blowing smoke rings all over the place. All on account of the generous "Clay."

The hospitable home of Dr. and Mrs. James H. Crawford has held within its cordial portals during the past week, three charming visitors: Mrs. H. R. Becker of East Orange, New Jersey, Mrs. H. R. Bailey of Washington, D. C. and Mrs. Charles Swann of Pell City, sisters of Mrs. Crawford. This attractive trio of vivacious and interesting guests were the inspiration of numerous social courtesies extended them during their happy sojorn in our midst.

Mr. and Mrs. Garvin Baker entertained on last Monday in honor of their son, Bobby's eighth birthday. Games contests and refreshments were enjoyed by a large group of children.

LITTLE THINGS

"Such tender, simple things make life worth while—
Illusive thoughts we cannot quite express;
A laugh, a tear, the memory o fa smile,
The touch of hands in sudden, soft caress;
At dawn a bird song rising sweet and high;
That breathless moment when the hushed trees wake;
The clear, soft colors of a morning sky
Repeated on the surface of a lake;
The hours we spent together on that day
When all the world was far and we alone—
Those golden hours that slowly turned to gray
And with the setting sun were lost and gone;
The smell of rain-swept lilacs in the park;
A lover's kiss, a quarrel, then forgiving—
All these are tapers lightening up the dark
When days grow dull and sad with too much living—"

And so, with a tribute to the "little things" that light the horizon of our lives and keep us going, we bring our weekly ramble to a close. Those "little things" that express Life's meaning and reflect the sparkling gems of thoughtfulness that brighten our pathway. They sum up the total value of our days. We gratefully acknowledge the flowers, the cotton blooms, the plums, the peaches, the letters from friends far and near, the little pop calls from comrades here. The breezy bits of cheerfulness offered; the encouragement of prominent citizens from Shelby County who drop in for discussions of the day. They are veritable land marks of loveliness that light an otherwise rather dimly lit goal toward which we daily work. Thanks to those of you who made the week a happier one.

THE WET OLD SMACK

By NANCY RHODES

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

MISS MAGINLEY, division manager of the fifth floor of Gordon's department store, had a sudden and not unpleasant stricture about her heart as Mason, the assistant buyer of women's machine-mades, stepped into her office. Funny how the old heart kind of flipped and turned over when that kid looked at her out of those level gray eyes! And when he accidentally brushed her shoulder or touched her hand . . .

But she was getting worse than one of the little bundle girls—that new one, for instance, with the round baby face.

"D'ye suppose we could wangle an ad out of old Mack for those pintucked jerseys?" asked Mason, dropping into a chair beside her desk and running a hand over his smooth black head. "I told Clemmens she overstocked on those when she make the buy. They haven't moved for three weeks."

"'Tisn't the first time Clemmens has overstocked," said Miss Maginley, bending the neck of a flexible desk light so that the white glare fell on her green blottered desk, rather than flared into her carefully rouged face.

Awful hard things to face, these desk lights, after a woman got to be forty—well, over thirty-five.

"Thank the Lord Clemmens is going over to Levy's next month. They are offering her fifty more a month and a higher commission," added Miss Maginley.

The boy—she wondered if he could possibly be over twenty-five—took a deep breath and she could almost hear him pray to be allowed to step into Clemmens' shoes. By right of seniority and ability he and Miss Cohen were neck by neck in line for the Clemmens' vacancy, and Miss Maginley's word would be the deciding factor. For a moment the reassuring word trembled on her lips but some instinct choked it back and it died unspoken in her throat.

"How are those figured broadcloths going?" she asked, as Mason started to get to his feet with a half-impatient gesture. Anything to keep his in the office a while longer. How those gray eyes did get her going!

"Fine," said Mason, absently, fingering the doorknob. "Fine. There is something I'd like to talk over with you, when you have plenty of time," he continued. "A stunt they're starting over at Levy's, and I think we could work the same thing here. Some day when you're not busy . . ."

"Come out to my apartment for dinner tonight," said Miss Maginley, so quickly that she could have bitten her tongue when she thought it over. The deuce and all would be to pay if the kid ever got the idea that she was sweet on him.

"It's my turn on the dinners," said Mason, hesitating. "You've had me out twice and I haven't had you out yet."

"I love to cook," said Miss Maginley, dismissing his argument with a little wave of her fat, white hand. "See you at seven."

After he had gone she sat for a moment making ideal curlicues on a block of scratch paper. Funny the way that kid made her feel! Times when she actually blushed when he looked at her unexpectedly! Could it be that the foolish forties had her by the throat?

After all, older women than she had married younger men than Mason. Women didn't get old any more, and forty was just the prime of life, anyway.

The prime of life. She rolled the phrase over her tongue as she stepped out on the department floor. Almost as soon as she crossed the threshold she saw Mason and the youngest stock girl standing by the elevators in earnest conversation. The girl's cheeks were flushed and she looked angry.

Miss Maginley herself felt vaguely irritated. She must speak to Mason about hanging around in corners with that girl. An assistant buyer owed it to himself to keep up his prestige.

Prestige was what counted in this game. A person who didn't look after his prestige was sunk, simply sunk.

You couldn't tell Miss Maginley anything about prestige. She had learned all about it during the process of pulling herself up by her bootstraps.

Frowning and slightly irritated, she paced down the green velvet carpet while a group of gossipping girls watched her admiringly. Everyone on the floor knew that Miss Maginley never wore anything but models and lavender chiffon underwear. Heaven alone knew what she spent a year on clothes, and since she had had that darker shade of henna on her boyish bob, she looked simply marvelous.

The feeling of depression remained with Miss Maginley, however, until she unlocked the door of her apartment. Then her spirits lightened perceptibly.

The long, pleasant living room, with its deep, cushioned chairs and its bright lamp shades, sent a never-failing glow of pleased proprietorship over her.

At seven o'clock the things that should be hot were simmering on the range and the things that should be served cold were chilling in the electric refrigerator, while Miss Maginley stood in front of her full-length mirror daubing her eyes and the corners of her mouth with a rare perfume. She slipped into a teagown, bought because it reminded her of a passionate love scene in the movies, and she sighed a little as she noticed that it made her thickening body take on even heavier curves than showed in a dark business dress. Of course she didn't have one of these lead pencil figures like that young stock girl, for instance, but she wasn't fat! And men liked these lacey, frilly things. What always happened in the movies when the heroine donned a tea gown or a negligee? Lord!

A ring at the door started that funny feeling around her heart. All through dinner her heart continued to thump and flip over when the kid looked into her eyes. After dessert, Miss Maginley lighted a long gold-tipped cigarette, drew little puffs into her mouth and spat them out again. The smoke got into her eyes, as it always did, and reddened her lids.

Mason watched her with an amused smile.

"You women!" he said indulgently. "You don't smoke. You just puff it in and out again. Never inhale."

"I'm not a smoking woman," said Miss Maginley, getting up and going across the room to sit beside him in the deeply cushioned davenport.

The tea gown frothed around her and the odor of a rare perfume hung heavily in the air. She tipped back her head until her double chin went taut as she looked from under drooping lids at Mason. He moved uneasily under her gaze.

"About that Levy proposition," he began abruptly. And they talked about the Levy proposition until they had exhausted all angles of it.

A silence fell between them. A perfumed silence, thought Miss Maginley, who knew her captions. Perhaps the boy was shy. After all she had never given him much encouragement. Might he not be a little overawed by her position and salary. She moved her hand across the plush davenport until it touched his fingers, which closed over hers. She moved closer and her head dropped to his shoulder. He slipped his free arm around her.

She rehearsed the scene dreamily the next morning, as she sat before her desk, making curlicues on her blotter. The boy hadn't said much; neither had she. They sat there like a couple of bashful kids. Lord! At her age! She smiled as she thought that he might be rehearsing the same scene in his cubbyhole of an office that adjoined hers. Two souls with but a single thought and just a thin wall between them. She arose and started towards the door. At that moment she heard voices on the other side of the partition.

"Well," said a flippant young voice that she recognized as belonging to the little stock girl. "How's the old lady's darling this morning?"

"I wish you wouldn't talk about her like that, dear," answered Mason. "She's a wet old smack, I know, and kind of lonely and pathetic, to my mind. Not so bad underneath the rouge and perfume . . ."

"An honest heart beats neath her model's gown," paragraphed the stock girl.

Miss Maginley staggered blindly out to the department. Lord! Why should the store manager pick this of all times to talk to her? He had Miss Clemmens' job on his chest.

"I suppose Mason's the logical person to step in there?" he asked.

A gust of anger started Miss Maginley trembling. As she stood speechless Mason walked out of his cubbyhole, looked at her with his level gray eyes, and smiled in his grave friendly way. Lord! How it got to her, that smile! She hoped she wasn't going to cry like a fool . . . or a wet old smack . . . but not so bad . . . under the rouge.

"Oh, yes, let the boy have it," she said wearily. "I don't care."

Prehistoric Crematory Found by Kansas Men

G. H. Wood and Mark Reeve, Friends university professors and experts on Indian lore, believe that a prehistoric crematory vault 12 miles southeast of Wichita, Kan., may be the key to an unknown civilization existing in Kansas centuries before the American Indian. The vault was discovered recently by Lyle Cherry, Derby, Kan., farmer, when his plow dislodged a large slab, revealing a crypt, according to a United Press correspondent in the New York Herald-Tribune.

In the interior were rocks and a considerable deposit of charcoal. The scientists dug to the floor and discovered fine ashes, believed to be those of human bones. The kiln was ten feet long, seven feet wide and six high. There are five similar mounds within 150 feet of the original discovery.

The kiln was walled up and roofed with stone slabs. A narrow passageway wound downward around the clay pit. Wood pointed out that the burial was marked by high honors because the rock used for the tomb is found only at a site twelve miles away.

A geological map of the vicinity shows the tomb was located on the banks of a stream, although it is impossible to see any indication of the vanished stream today. Silt marks were found on the walls of the vault, indicating the stream must have flooded that region once and seeped into the crypt.

Gossip a Confession

GOSSIP is always a personal confession either of malice or imbecility, and the young should not only shun it, but by the most thorough culture relieve themselves from all temptation to indulge in it. It is a low, frivolous, and too often a dirty business. There are country neighborhoods in which it rages like a pest. Churches are split in pieces by it. Neighbors are made enemies by it for life. In many persons it degenerates into a chronic disease, which is practically incurable. Let the young cure it while they may. —J. G. Holland.

For the Style-Conscious Little Girls

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

IT IS with ever increasing enthusiasm that designers are yielding to the urge of catering to the needs and fancies of style-conscious little girls.

The story of the modern child's wardrobe resolves itself into many chapters dealing with all phases of fashion. Beginning with simple, novel and amusing beach, swim and playtime togs and cunning sun suits, the plot carries on through thrilling adventures in the realm of smart school and dressy daytime clothes reaching a grand and glorious climax in way of entrancing pretty-pretty party frocks that make every little girl look like a fairy princess of story book lore.

For practical daytime and playtime frocks the call is outstanding for cotton reps, gabardines, chambrays, crinkled seersuckers (no ironing required is their big appeal), ginghams, novelty cottons soft and spongy, piques and most important, new linens both plain and printed. Now that a sturdy non-crush type of linen is obtainable mothers are jubilant, for in it they have discovered the fabric ideal to withstand the vigorous test of the wear and tear of the thousand and one antics which little folks enjoy in a day's sport.

Perhaps the most exciting news is gay printed linens in bold patterns and colorings. Peasant designs in a blaze of daring colors abound and these rustic prints are especially good-looking when made up into separate little coats with hats to match. Florals in effective spacing, cunning animal, vegetable and fruit motifs on the new printed linens are a special lure to children. Then there are the exquisitely sheer printed handkerchief linens and the fine dimities which are adorable for dress-up wear.

Lace-trimmed organdie or georgette is a favorite theme this season with the designers of little-girl party dresses. Georgette made over taffeta is shown quite a little. A significant trend is the use of pastel colors which seem to have almost gained precedence over all white.

In the matter of styling, the princess silhouette is a great favorite while most sleeves are just short puffs. Note the dress worn by the little girl with the gorgeous doll in the picture. Her smart school and playtime dress is of firm linen cut on the new princess lines. Gay striped printed linen is used as a bordering. The style distinction of this charming dress will make instant appeal to both mother and little daughter.

The other two children are looking their prettiest in dainty party frocks or perhaps they took part in "last day of school" exercises. At any rate their little pleated sheer frocks are lovely and will be a joy the whole summer through. The wee maiden to the left is wearing an accordion pleated voile as charming in pastel colors as it is in white. A wide sash about her waist ties at the back in a huge butterfly bow.

Tiers of narrow pleatings animate the frock centered in the group. The vogue for pleating is as pronounced in children's fashions as in grown-up styles. The pleatings about the neckline extend over the short puff sleeves so as to achieve the new-vogue wide shoulder line.

IT'S EMBROIDERED

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The latest call of the mode is for frocks of monotone silk crepe with complementary jackets made of the identical silk crepe of the dress, the same handsomely allover embroidered in bright contrasting colors. In the instance of the model pictured the sports dress is of pink silk crepe with a short-sleeved box jacket of the same crepe embroidered with green and blue wool. Blue buttons are on the dress.

Short-Term Wigs.

Wigs are proving popular among fashionable women in London, who use them to cover hair while it is regaining its natural color after a "blond" period.

Black Is Smart

Much black is shown for summer wear with tailored white jackets and white accessories.

DESIGNERS PRESENT SKIRT INNOVATIONS

Unusual color combinations and a strong Oriental influence characterize the new Alix collection. Some skirts are so full and flaring that they resemble parachutes or lamp shades, while others, are caught under at the hem like Turkish trousers.

The feminine silhouette is stressed at all times and clothes at Alix are fashioned to display a slender waistline and curving hip line. For day wear, bodices are skin tight and are usually made with a high neck trimmed with bows or loops of material. All clothes show a certain amount of fullness at the hip, and this is frequently stressed by the use of a full and flaring peplum.

Glamorous Apparel Wins Approval of Parisiennes

For the polo matches, the races and late afternoon occasions of summer in Paris, it is now the smartest fashion to wear frocks and hats of the glamorous variety. Sheer fabrics like organdie are altogether enchanting and feminine for frocks with wide and sweeping skirts and hats with wide and flattering brims.

These decorative full-skirted frocks, with little capes or puffed sleeves, have not by any means replaced the tailored evening costume with a jacket, an important fashion for parties from five o'clock on. Daylight dining will enhance this tailored idea.

Culottes More Popular

The fashion for culottes (divided skirts) is no longer confined to the active sports field, say stylists. They will be seen everywhere for all daytime occasions this summer. Last season saw them first spring into popularity for sailing, bicycling and beach wear.

"Stomach Periscope" May Permit Early Cancer Diagnosis

Flexible New Tube "Sees" by Means of Forty-Six Lenses

KANSAS CITY. — An instrument that might be called a stomach periscope may be the means of preventing many cases of stomach cancer. It was shown at the scientific exhibit of the American Medical association here.

The instrument, a flexible tube called a gastroscope, for looking inside the stomach, was designed by Dr. Rudolf Schindler of Chicago and his colleagues, Drs. Marie Ortmayer and John F. Renshaw.

The flexibility of the instrument gives it a tremendous advantage over the earlier style of rigid gastroscope. Made of flexible metal, covered with rubber, it contains 46 hand-ground lenses on the inside. At the end of the two and a half foot tube is a small light. The tube is no larger around than one's finger.

Sees in All Directions.

Because of its flexibility it can be bent backward and to the side or in any direction, thus enabling the physician to see every part of the stomach. This was not possible with the old model rigid gastroscope.

Doctor Schindler, in showing it to physicians, held a book at one end and turned the tube in all directions, but the person looking through the tube could read the printed page no matter how the tube was bent.

Advantage Over X-Ray

The patient experiences no discomfort and there is no danger of injury with this instrument. The patient's throat is anesthetized, the tube is passed down it, and the examination of the stomach is made in a minute or two. This can be done in the doctor's office and the patient is able afterward to go on to his work. One patient had the tube passed into his stomach 65 times.

This instrument gives far more accurate information about the condition of the stomach than even the X-ray. With it the physician will be able to detect not only the presence of cancer, but the amount of cancer present and whether it is an operable type.

Electrical Hotbed Helps Truck Farmer Speed Plant Growth

MAGNOLIA, ARK. — Like many truck farmers Charles J. Gault near here worried about preseason competition from the warmer Rio Grande area.

Now his problem is solved by the use of an electrical hotbed capable of growing 1,000,000 plants and having a total area of one-tenth of an acre.

Temperature Changes.

Eight thousand feet of soil-heating cable are used in eight covered beds. Temperatures of from 50 to 60 degrees Fahrenheit can be maintained in the ground when outside temperatures are as low as 15 or 20 degrees. The air temperature of the beds ranged from 40 to 60 degrees.

Brain Injuries Change Methods of Learning

EVANSTON, ILL. — How injuries to the brain may interfere with learning is indicated by experiments with rats reported to the Midwestern Psychological association here by Dr. I. Krechevsky, of the University of Chicago.

The manner in which learning takes place in the injured animals was the subject of the study rather than their ability to solve any given problem.

The injured animals tend to do the same thing over and over and to lack versatility or variety in their response even though the injury may be a relatively minor one.

They also show a loss of ability to work out some general method of attack for a problem. According to an analysis of the normal learning process previously made by Drs. Krechevsky and E. C. Tolman, of the University of California, these two factors are all-important—first the ability to hit upon some generalized mode of attack for the problem and second a versatility or plasticity that will enable the individual to try first one possible solution and then another until the best answer is found.

Lesson for July 12

WITNESSING UNDER PERSECUTION

LESSON TEXT—Acts 3:1-4:31.

GOLDEN TEXT—We ought to obey God rather than men.—Acts 5:29.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Brave Peter and John.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Two Brave Preachers.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Two Brave Witnesses.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC — Courageous Witnessing for Christ.

In I Corinthians 1:21-25, Paul sets forth the attitude of the world toward Christ and his gospel. The one who preaches Christ crucified must expect opposition, and even violent persecution. This attitude of the world, instead of being a deterrent, should be a spur to activity.

I. Peter Healing the Lame Man (Acts 3:1-11).

The place (vv. 1, 2). It was at the beautiful gate which leads from the outer to the inner court of the temple. This helpless man had been placed at the entrance of the place of worship where he might receive the sympathetic attention of worshipers.

2. The man (v. 2). This beggar was infirm from his birth. He was not more than forty years old (Acts 4:22). When he saw Peter and John, he asked alms.

3. The method (vv. 3-8).

a. Gaining the man's attention (v. 4), Peter and John commanded him to look on them. He asked for money and got healing.

b. Peter commanded him in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth to rise and walk (v. 6). This was the very thing he had been unable to do all his life, but with the command went the ability to do.

c. Peter took him by the right hand (v. 7), gave impetus to his faith, not strength to his ankles.

4. The man's response (v. 8). Strength at once came to him. He stood, walked, leaped, and shouted praises to God.

5. The effect (vv. 9-11). The people were so filled with wonder that they ran together to behold this thing. There could be no question as to the genuineness of the miracle for the man had been a familiar figure for many years.

a. This helpless man had to be carried to the temple. Men and women out of Christ are so helpless that they need to be brought where the life of God can be applied to them.

b. Peter, taking the man by the hand, shows the manner of helping the lost. Christian witnesses should bring them to Jesus.

II. Peter Witnessing Before the Multitude (Acts 3:12-26).

Though this miracle directed the attention of the people to Peter and John, Peter seized the opportunity to present Christ to the people.

III. Peter in Prison for Christ's Sake (Acts 4:1-4).

1. The leaders. Both priests and Sadducees joined in this persecution (vv. 1, 2).

The priests were intolerant because these new teachers were encroaching upon their functions. The Sadducees did not believe in the resurrection, which was a vital part of the apostolic preaching.

2. The result (vv. 3, 4). Though they were held in bondage by chains, Christ continued to work. The number of believers greatly increased.

IV. Peter Witnessing Before the Sanhedrin (Acts 4:5-21).

1. The inquiry (vv. 5-7). The inquirers admitted the reality of the miracle but they wanted to know what it signified.

2. Peter's answer (vv. 8-12). With stinging sarcasm he showed them that they were not on trial as evildoers, but for doing good in the name of Christ to the helpless and needy man.

3. The impression upon the Sanhedrin (vv. 13-21).

a. They marveled (v. 13). They were made conscious that they were on trial instead of sitting as judges.

b. They took knowledge that Peter and John had been with Jesus (v. 13).

c. They forbade them to speak in Christ's name (v. 18). They could not deny the miracle or gainsay the accusation brought against them, so they attempted intimidation.

d. Peter and John's reply (vv. 19, 20). They expressed their determination to obey God rather than men.

e. Their release (v. 21). Seeing that the people were on the side of the apostles, the rulers were helpless.

V. The Church at Prayer (vv. 23-31).

As soon as Peter and John were set free, they hastened to their fellow disciples and told their experiences. They praised God for deliverance and prayed for boldness to speak the Word of God.

Pulling Together

If the money getters would line up behind the knowledge getters, and all pull together in a definite well-organized plan, we'd raise the standards of human life higher than the most fantastic imagination ever dreamed they could be raised.

Loving Others

One whom I knew intimately and whose memory I revere, once in my hearing remarked that, "unless we love people we cannot understand them." This was a new light to me.—Rossetti.

A Charming Sports Frock

Trim modish raglan shoulders, no sleeves to set in, make this attractive dress easily fashioned by even an amateur sewer. And the neckline is extremely flattering and youthful. Equally lovely for office wear or busy shoppers, it answers perfectly, too, for general daytime functions.

No. 1857-B

You'll appreciate the two roomy pockets, and the back yoke will enable you to "bear your burdens" lightly. Try making it in tub silk, shantung, printed crepe or linen. Whichever fabric you choose gives a silhouette that is universally flattering and a touch of sophistication.

Barbara Bell Pattern No. 1857-B is available in sizes: 14, 16, 18, 20; 40 and 42. Corresponding bust measurements 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. Size 16 (34) requires 3 7-8 yards of 39 inch material plus 1-4 yard for the belt. Send 15 cents in coins for the pattern.

The Summer Pattern Book containing 100 Barbara Bell well-planned, easy-to-make patterns is ready. Send 15 cents in coins for your copy.

Send your order to The Sewing Circle Pattern Dept., 367 W Adams St., Chicago, Ill.

The Last Word

Mother and father were having a few words when father said: "I don't believe in parading my virtues."

"No?" answered mother. "I don't think you could, dear. It takes a number, you know, to make a parade."

DOLLARS & HEALTH

The successful person is a healthy person. Don't let yourself be handicapped by sick headaches, a sluggish condition, stomach "nerves" and other dangerous signs of over-acidity.

TAKE MILNESIAS

Milnesia, the original milk of magnesia in wafer form, neutralizes stomach acid. Each wafer equals 4 teaspoonfuls of milk of magnesia. Thin, crunchy, mint-flavor, tasty. 20c, 35c & 60c at drug stores.

HEARTBURN?

Its surprising how many have heart burn. Hurried eating, overeating, heavy smoking, excessive drinking all lead to heartburn. When it comes, heed the warning. Your stomach is on a strike.

SLEEP SOUNDLY

Lack of exercise and injudicious eating make stomachs acid. You must neutralize stomach acids if you would sleep soundly all night and wake up feeling refreshed and really fit.

With much talk about the weather and "nobody doing anything about it"—as stated by Mark Twain, Old Sol continues his hectic march across the heavens, but the officers "Under the Dome" have banded together and in some miraculous way have installed a new and up to date Drinking Fountain featuring the universally popular drink—ICED WATER! An improvement long needed! The imposing structure containing H-2-O, is the most welcome addition noted in the refinishing, painting ando general repair program recently completed. So, its "Pass around the water and we'll all take a drink" in the Corridor—at any hour you may chance to stroll through. Come on in Stranger and quench your thirst!

Twenty million ballots will be sent out by the Literary Digest in an endeavor to answer the question WHO will be our next President, two months before the Election. The past Digest test votes, have been uncannily accurate. We await their poll with keen eagerness—but are still staking our "nickels" on Franklin Delano Roosevelt!

Alabama Farmers Growing More Pigs

MONTGOMERY—Alabama has 24 per cent more pigs than it had at this time last year, reports J. C. Garrett, State and Federal statician, who states that 638,000 pigs are on farms of he State compared with 515,000 at the same time last year.

The present pig crop is the largest in Alabama since 1924, says the statistician. "The increase is due both to larger numbers of sows farrowing and to a larger number of pigs saved per litter.

"The average number of pigs saved was 5.65 per litter this spring compared with 5.36 per litter in the spring of 1935. Sows farrowing this spring are estimated at 113,000 head. or 118 per cent of the 96,000 head that farrowed in the spring of 1935.

Mr. Garrett also reports that there are 29 per cen more pigs in the United States this year than were last year. The estimate is 41,884,000, an increase of 9,504,000.

Do you know only four states have more illiteracy than Alabama?

COOPERATION FROM PARENTS NEEDED TO DECREASE EPIDEMIC

Dr. J. N. Baker, State health officer, said Sunday he was hopeful the infantile paralysis epidemic in North Alabama had about reached its peak and would decline from now on with the continued cooperation of all citizens and all agencies which he said has been a powerful factor in curbing the spread of the disease.

His statement was made following receipt during the day of reports of four new cases, two in Jefferson, one in Lawrence and one in Escambia The case reported by a physician at Canoe in Escambia County was, in his opinion "sporadic," and not connected in any way with the North Alabama epidenic. No additional fatalities were recorded during the day.

Though the number of new cases of which he was officially advised was relatively small yesterday. Dr. Baker did not seek to discount in any way the possibility that they might be added to substantially today with the arrival of reports tha were deferred over the week end. This possibility was taken fully into consideration, however, in connection with his statement that he was hopeful the peak of the epidemic had about been reached.

Possible Prevention

The presence already in Alabama of a hitherto unheralded agency that may prove of material assistance in abating the epidemic and stamping out the disease, was made public for the first time last night by Dr. D. G. Gill, director of the Bureau of Preventable Diseases of the State Health Department, who said the department had forwarded to every physician in Alabama full particulars concerning a preventive formula for use as a nasal spray which has been made available by the United States Public Health Service, and directions as to its use. This formula is a solution of picric acid and sodium alum. Through wholesale druggists and drug stores it should be available in all sections of the state early in the week, he said.

MR. DEEDS GOES TO TOWN AT STRAND

Once again the matchless genius of Frank Capra has asserted itself and brought to the screen a triumph of the highest calibre. There can no longer be any doubt that Mr. Capra is in a class alone so far as motion picture direction is concerned. He makes a few pictures, but they bear the unmistakable mark of technical perfection.

To this director's last three films Lady for a Day, It Happened One Night, and Broadway Bill, each of them fine enough to warm the heart of an ordinary director for the duration of his professional life—is added now "Mr. Deeds Goes To Town," which opens today at the Strand Theatre with Gary Cooper and Jean Arthur in the important roles.

It is an enchanting film, merry, human, romantic, intelligent, in the inimitable Capra manner. It brings a new and charming Gary Cooper to his innumerable fans, and it finds in Jean Arthur a star of the first magnitude, lovely, clever and sparkling. Together, under Mr. Capra's guiding wand, they have given a performance that lacks nothing. Mr. Cooper and Miss Arthur have a treat in store for you.

NOTICE!

The Shelby County Division Farmers Union will hold an old fashion basket picnic at Camp Branch-Saginaw School on Thursday, July 30th, beginning at 10 A. M. The public is invited and especially all crafts of organized labor.

National President E. H. Everson of St. Charles, South Dakota and other prominent speakers will be on the program.

M. R. Douglas, County Secretary.

This makes school money from property taxes, state, county and city, about $5,000,000 less.

Do you know Alabama property values are $322,000,000 less than they were five years ago?

Cash Farm Income Is Almost Doubled

AUBURN — Cash farm income from cotton, wheat, tobacco, corn, and hogs increased 90 per cent from 1932 to 1935, according to figures submitted in the annual report of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

"The cash income from the five major commodities increased from $1,365,000,000 in 1932 to $2,593,000,000 in 1935, while the cash income from all other farm products increased from $3,012,000,000 in 1932 to $4,307,000,000 in 1935," says Dr. L. N. Duncan, director of the State Extension Service, in releasing the report.

"These figures combined show that the annual cash income from farm products increased from $4,377,000,000 in 1932 to $6,700,000,000 in 1935. Rental and benefit payments accounted for nearly 25 per cent of this increase. The remainedr is attributed to increase in prices.

Higher Farm Income Increases New Cars

AUBURN—New automobile registrations in Alabama totaled 39,332 in 1935 compared with only 10,357 in 1932, Dr. L. N. Duncan, director of the State extension service reported today in pointing out that the cash receipts from the sale of principal farm products in the state rose from $59,066,000 in 1932 to $104,292,000 in 1935, an increase of 77 per cent.

This increase in farm income has not only helped farmers but it has greatly improved business conditions throughout the State, he said.

Do you know the State minimum program sets an average of $75. per month, or $525. per year for a seven month term?

Farmers of Shelby Receive Payments

Farmers of Shelby County received a total of $240,268.76 in rental and benefit payments and profits on cotton options between the time hte AAA program started in 1933 and February 29th this year, reports A. A. Lauderdale, County Agent, who has been responsible for distributing the checks to farmers in this county.

Total benefit payments to farmers throughout Alabama have amounted to $39,237.230. Statistics furnished by County Agent Lauderdale also show that the total value of cotton and cotton seed increased from $37,402,000 in 1932 to $84,105,839 in 1935 an increase of 125 per cent.

In releasing these figures, Mr. Lauderdale stated that this increase in income has played an important par in increasing the business conditions in Shelby County and the State of Alabama.

ALABAMA HAS ONE OF MOST ECONOMICAL SETUPS OF THE NATION IN SCHOOL SYSTEMS

MONTGOMERY— Further evidence of the economy of Alabama's school system is seen in the tendency of other states to do away with small districts and organize on a county—wide or state—wide basis. The latest state to advocate abolishing small districts is Oregon, where John H. Carkin of the State Tax Commission, estimated $3,000,000 can be cut from the present cost of $17,000,000.

Alabama, recently described in Washington as having one of the most economical setups in the nation, has the county unit system. There are 67 county and 45 city districts, contrasted to as many as 10, 000 districts in some states. The larger districts made necessary fewer boards and superintendents, cutting expense.

Heart Drifts

THE LOVE THAT YOU RETURNED TO ME

The love that you returned to me,
dear one,
Is love that you shall hunger for,
you say.
Is it because its hold has grown too strong
That fearing thraldom you must go away?
"I hurry from the potency of need
For all you give. I am afraid that I
Who love you more than you, dear, do believe Shall grow to loathe love's bondage by and by."

'Tis thus you speak. You are a little boy
Who sees the world as his brave hunting ground
And fears to claim one spot as his alone
Lest owning it, his spirit will be bound.
Love must be free—I kno wthat
more than you.
Wind, spring, dawn, stars are not held in the hand.
Yet there's no force that can uproot
them, dear,
Love is not grasped—oh, don't you understand?

—H. W.

HAPPINESS

If I might have one prayer and one
alone
Granted for all the hearts that I hold dear
(Aside from the untimate peace),
I could make it known
In a brief petition—one word crystal clear:
Happiness! God grant it now, I pray,
That shining something in the human breast
With which men walk light-hearted
all the way,
Without which there is never any rest.

Happiness! One brief and shining word,
Yet underlying it is all of good,
No heart is happy quite, Thou
knowest Lord,
Unless beneath it life runs as it should:
A clean, clear, sparkling stream to heal and bless,
Man's highest goal on earth is happiness.

TOIL AWAY

Toil away and set the stone
That shall stand when you are gone.
Ask not that another see
The meaning of your masonry.

Grind the gem and dig the well,
For what? For whom?—I cannot tell.
The stone may mark a boundary line,
The well may flow, the gem may shine.

Be it wage enough for you
To shape them well and set them
true,
Of the future, who can tell?
Work, my friend, and so farewell.

—J. J. C.

RECORDED—WHERE?

When life is done,
And all these troublous days
Are but a ripple on the eternal sea;
When the rising sun,
Brilliant and warm, sheds no more light for me;
In what new phase
Shall my turbulent spirit then be manifest?
Perhaps when I
Go back into the elements, some pool
Hitherto calm will have strange tremors; high
In the air some bird may falter, or some cool
Sane clerk may drop his pen and beat his breast
Perhaps instead,
Some patient dust coalescing into stone
Will draw me into a different form of peace
Than ever I have dreamed of. When the lone
Last journey starts, and all these problems cease,
Where shall it be recorded? In sky or grass,
In forest or field or desert, what thing shall dread
Life for a startled moment while I pass?

HEALTH OFFICER OF SHELBY COUNTY WILL CLOSE PLAYGROUNDS

Reclassified In Chancery 1-6-38

Dr. H. C. Nickson, Shelby County Health Officer ,has ordered the cessation of all play ground and recreational activities until the Infantile Paralysis situation has cleared. The Playgrounds recently opened in Calera, Montevallo and Columbiana have been closed down. Dr. Nickson also urges the parents to cooperate with him in keeping children at home, and away from large crowds or groups where the danger in taking this dread malady is much greater.

BUSINESS WOMEN'S MEETING OPENED ON LAST SATURDAY AT ALABAMA STATE COLLEGE

MONTEVALLO—The conference of business women at Alabama College opened with a general meeting on Saturday morning at which Mrs. Eudora Ramsey Richardson, of Rhicmond, Va., spoke. Thursday evening she addressed the faculty and student body on the subject "Is This A Woman's World."

In addition to speaking to the group of business women assembled here, Mrs. Richardson was to lead the Student Career Conference, which was originally scheduled July 8-10, but which was indefinitely postponed on account of the prevalence of infantile paralysis in some sections of the State. This was purely a precautionary measure, according to President A. F. Harmon, and no plans have been announced for holding the meetisg at a later date durthe summer. Due to the crowded schedule on the campus between now and the opening of the next session it appears that the career meeting may not be held.

At the general meeting of busisess women at 2 o'clock Saturday afternoon Dr. J. A. Keller, State Superintendent of Education; Dean T. H. Napier, Dr. Iva L. Peters and Dr. Minnie L. Steckel were the speakers. At this time the special booklet on the Employability of Women, which was prepared by Alabama College in cooperation with the national and state Business and Professional Women's Clubs, was presented to the group.

Tea was served at 4 o'clock following the general discussion after the meeting.

Confederate Pension Warrants Mailed Out

MONTGOMERY—Confederate pension warrants for the quarterly period beginning July 1, totaling $166,110 were mailed to all probate judges in this state last week by State Auditor Charles E. McCall.

Drouth Damage Estimated at $300,000,000—Steel Fight Brings Union Labor Crisis—Landon Reconvenes Kansas Legislature.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

WHILE relentless heat drove the nation's farm losses from drouth toward the $300,000,000 mark and sent grain prices soaring, long needed rains in scattered regions of the drouth belt brought temporary relief. In sections of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, and Ohio, which faced the prospect of the disaster already confronting the Northwest, the rains were a Godsend to sun-parched corn fields, pastures, and crops of spring wheat. Rains in the Northwest revived portions of North and South Dakota, Montana and Nebraska.

But a heat wave lasting nearly a week had brought temperatures ranging from 90 to 114 in the Great Plains territory.

Twenty-three states, eight of them in the South, were listed as suffering in some degree from the drouth. Ten of them—North and South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Minnesota, Missouri, Tennessee, Oklahoma, Virginia and South Carolina—were already in a critical stage. Five others — Kentucky, Georgia, Alabama, North Carolina and West Virginia—were borderline cases. Eight others where the full severity of the drouth had not yet been felt were: Nebraska, Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, Illinois, Kansas, Indiana and Ohio.

With the full extent of the damage in the "dust bowl" area of the Northwest not yet known, the federal government made plans to deal with a long-range disaster. President Roosevelt, taking personal command of the relief program in Washington, announced that he would make a personal tour of the drouth-stricken areas within the next few weeks.

The President announced that the federal government had prepared a comprehensive plan whereby 170,000 out of 204,000 farm families impoverished by the drouth in the Northwest would be given immediate cash assistance. He declared that he will make his trip after the relief program has had an opportunity to get under way, to see for himself exactly how much damage was caused by the drouth and whether financially-ruined families are receiving the proper assistance.

He said that 50,000 farmers were being given jobs immediately on WPA projects at an average wage of $15 per week, carrying out useful work—digging wells, constructing earth dams to hold any rains which may fall in the near future and building farm-to-market roads. A livestock program is under way which would call for the movement of cattle from the arid sections as a private enterprise, to protect the foundation herds of the livestock growers.

ROMANCE outmaneuvered diplomacy in the life of Mrs. Ruth Bryan Owen, American minister to Denmark and former member of congress. The engagement of the daughter of William Jennings Bryan to Captain Boerge Rohde, an officer of the Danish army, was announced in Denmark by the latter's mother. Captain Rohde is a member of King Christian's personal bodyguard.

Ruth Bryan Owen

Captain Rohde arrived in America on the liner Drottningholm a day or two after his fiancee had reached the country. They were married at an estate on Long Island.

In political circles the opinion was expressed that Mrs. Owen will probably resign her diplomatic post in a short time. While there are no formal regulations which compel an American woman minister to resign when she weds, it has been customary for women in minor positions in the American foreign service to retire when they marry.

GOVERNOR Alf M. Landon returned to Topeka, Kas., after a vacation in the Colorado mountains, for the reconvening of the state legislature and to prepare for the acceptance speech he will deliver at the Republican notification ceremonies July 23.

The Republican presidential nominee appeared before a joint session of the legislature and urged passage of amendments to the state constitution to provide adequate social security measures. Governor Landon declared that care of the needy aged and others suffering misfortunes is a "public obligation."

Following his address, the Kansas senate adopted a constitutional amendment by a vote of 35 to 1, empowering the legislature to enact a uniform system of direct aid for needy aged persons, indigent infirm persons and others suffering misfortunes which give them a claim on society for aid. It likewise passed by a unanimous vote another proposed constitutional amendment authorizing the state to levy taxes on employers and employees for systems of old age pensions and unemployment insurance to which the beneficiary must contribute.

Meanwhile, Governor Landon opened a series of major conferences with farm leaders for the purpose of drafting a farm relief program for inclusion in his acceptance speech. He conferred with former Governor Frank O. Lowden of Illinois, and former Senator Otis F. Glenn, Senator Arthur Capper of Kansas, Representative Clifford Hope of Kansas and R. K. Laubengayer, a Kansas farm publisher.

AS THE long-awaited campaign to unionize the nation's steel industry was under way, one of the most serious crises in the history of the American labor movement arose when strife broke out between William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor and John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America and head of the Committee for Industrial Organization, who has promoted the unionization drive in the steel industry.

William Green

Meeting in Washington, the executive council of the American Federation of Labor considered the matter of suspending eight national and international unions on the ground that these eight unions have begun the formation of a rival, or duel labor federation.

John L. Lewis announced that he would not respond to a summons of the executive council to answer charges that he had violated the federation's policy by trying to organize 500,000 steel workers into one big industrial union instead of into several unions divided by crafts.

Should the rift widen and a break occur, observers believe it would split the organized labor movement and affect its prestige and power at a critical time.

Denouncing the action of the Lewis group, President Green declared:

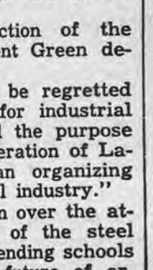
"It is sincerely to be regretted that the committee for industrial organization thwarted the purpose of the American Federation of Labor to inaugurate an organizing campaign in the steel industry."

Back of the collision over the attempted unionization of the steel industry are two contending schools of thought over the future of organized labor in America. One is that sponsored by Mr. Green which rose to power on a policy of trained craftsmen, trained by crafts The other is championed by John L. Lewis who visions a powerful labor machine organized regardless of crafts, which includes the semi-skilled and unskilled workers as well as the trained craftsmen.

DEFYING the threats of Communist members of the chamber of deputies, the French government decided to use armed force "with care" to oust French strikers who refuse to evacuate their places of business.

The announcement of this new policy was made by Minister of the Interior Roger Salengro, following the outbreak of fresh "folded arm" strikes in Paris and the provinces. It was estimated that 80,000 workers were still on strike in various industries throughout France.

SENATOR William E. Borah, about whose future political plans considerable doubt existed, formally announced that he would be a candidate for re-election to the senate.



Senator Borah

Several days before making his announcement the Idaho statesman had pledged allegiance to the Republican ticket and platform, thus removing the expressed doubts of many political leaders throughout the country regarding his stand in the presidential campaign. Previously Senator Borah had commented favorably on both the Republican and Democratic platforms, praising both for the stand they had taken on the question of monopolies.

The seventy-one-year-old senator in clarifying his position on the Republican platform said:

"I have no intention of bolting the ticket.

"I am supporting the platform and I have been supporting the platform from the beginning."

SOON after returning to his desk from a three-day pilgrimage to Virginia, President Roosevelt announced that he had granted Postmaster General James A. Farley leave of absence without pay from August 1 to November 5, the day after the presidential elections.

Thus Mr. Farley will be freed from official duties to devote himself during the next three months to the direction of the President's campaign for re-election. The announcement did not come as a surprise to those in informed political circles in Washington, but it had been rumored in some quarters that Mr. Farley would resign his cabinet post and retain his job as chairman of the Democratic National committee.

Mr. Farley announced that Representative Sam Rayburn of Texas would be chairman of the Democratic speakers' bureau. The campaign, he said, would be in full swing by Labor Day.

President Roosevelt's sojourn in Virginia took him to the dedication of Shenandoah National Park, to Monticello, the home of Thomas Jefferson and to Williamsburg, capital of the Old Dominion from 1699 to 1779. In an address at Jefferson's home, the President called on the nation to rekindle the "sacred fire" of "true freedom" which had lighted the "golden age" of American history. He declared the present emergency required the same leadership as that displayed by Thomas Jefferson.

CUTTING a big cake to celebrate his ninety-seventh birthday, John D. Rockefeller predicted that he would live to be one hundred. Despite temperature of 92 in the shade, the famous nonagenarian donned a sun helmet and went outdoors on his summer estate near Lakewood, N. J.

The multimillionaire oil man and philanthropist did not let the celebration of his birthday interfere with his daily nap or his daily afternoon automobile ride.

Mr. Rockefeller long since has given up all forms of athletic activities, including golf, formerly his favorite pastime. A few years ago he was down to a few holes of golf a day, but now he has given it up entirely. It has been his custom to spend his winters at Ormond Beach, Fla., and his summers either at Lakewood or at his other estate at Pocantico Hills near Tarrytown, N. Y.

WAR-WORRIED Europe shifted its anxiety from the Italo-Ethiopian sanctions problem to the newer and baffling question of what to do about the Free City of Danzig now seeking to free itself from the bonds of the League of Nations.

Adolf Hitler

The league disposed of the sanctions problem by voting to abolish them, thus to all practical intents and purposes removing Ethiopia from the family of sovereign states. Appearing personally before the league assembly, the refugee emperor, Haile Selassie, made a last moving bid for Ethiopia's freedom.

The "king of kings" denounced France and Great Britain without mentioning their names. To the generally expressed desire to reform the league, he said the weakness was not the league covenant itself, but a lack of international morality. The Negus' request for a loan of $50,000,000 to Ethiopia was voted down. Previously Haile had informed Capt. Anthony Eden, British foreign secretary, that he would return to Ethiopia immediately to join his loyal tribesmen and fight for Ethiopian independence.

With Mussolini given satisfaction, the Danzig situation brought into the foreground the figure of Adolf Hitler, chancellor of Nazi Germany. It was a Nazi follower of Hitler, Dr. Arthur Greiser, president of the Danzig senate, who demanded independence for the former German city now surrounded by Polish territory and who denounced the league and Sean Lester, league high commissioner for the port.

Observers were of the opinion that Greiser was acting under orders from Chancellor Hitler. In view of Germany's expansionist program and its rearmament, they feel that Danzig will be the next Nazi objective now that the Rhineland is remilitarized. By the elimination of Commissioner Lester or by the curtailment of his authority over the international affairs of the city, it is believed the Nazi would be in a position to crush the opposition party and pave the way for annexation of Danzig by Germany.

A TOLL of 346 lives was exacted in the celebration of the Fourth of July throughout the United States.

Booming cannon crackers played a comparatively innocent part in the slaughter, for only 11 lives were lost in accidents due to firecrackers.

But if the nation heeded warnings about the danger of fireworks, it forgot the menace of motoring accidents, for 208 people in 36 states were killed as the result of accidents on streets and highways. Ninety persons were drowned in 36 states. Miscellaneous tragedies accounted for 37 additional fatalities in 15 states

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

FAMOUS WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington. — President Roosevelt is enormously pleased with the general reception of his acceptance speech at Philadelphia.

Those who must support him for party regularity reasons but who have been hoping he would be more conservative if re-elected — the group following Senators Glass, Byrd, Tydings and Adams—are distressed. And the radical fringe is delighted.

The thought of comparing the New Deal fight against capital—against investments, if you please—to the fight of the colonists against British royal domination—came to the President almost at the last moment. He did not prepare his speech much in advance, and it is pretty nearly an accident that he took this particular tack.

It all grew out of the fuss and furore that was kicked up when announcement was made, a little more than a month ago, that the President would make his trip to Texas and other states at a time when the Republican national convention would be in progress. It was charged he was trying to steal the convention's publicity, to deprive it of its normal share of front page newspaper display, not to mention radio broadcasting and newspaper picture sections.

So he announced that on that trip he would make "historical talks," going into the history of the sections he visited.

He not only did, but found some very adroit ways of working good political arguments into them.

Even Went Further

But the conservative Democrats are very unhappy as a result. For, once embracing that theme, the President went a great deal further, by inference, than he has ever gone before. Just as, in the platform, which of course he dictated, he went a great deal further with regard to TVA than he has ever gone before. In fact, he approved language which might have been disquieting to the Supreme Court in his TVA decision. For instead of talking about "incidental" power, the President had the platform boast about the "yardstick" which would force electric rates down, and make electric current cheaper to all consumers.

Naturally the radical fringe is highly pleased. They had been somewhat disturbed at the soft-pedaling of their leaders at Philadelphia—the complete blackout of Dr. Tugwell, the failure to mention Prof. Frankfurter, the absence of most of the so-called Brain Trusters. But a few hours before the President was accepting the nomination Secretary of Agriculture Wallace was telling an audience that competition must go, even in manufacturing, eventually, and that collectivism and co-operatives were the thing!

All of which spells a much wider cleavage in the Democratic party, next year, assuming that Roosevelt is re-elected. For beyond the shadow of a doubt there would have been more than 21 Democratic senators opposed to that tax bill, aimed so sharply at corporations, had the President and Wallace made their speeches before instead of after that final vote in the senate.

Humorous Mistake

Failure of the Democrats at Philadelphia to make any statement answering the demand of the Republicans at Cleveland that the special power given the President to mark down still further the gold value of the dollar be revoked, was not an oversight.

Senator Robert J. Bulkley of Ohio, one of the leading Capitol Hill experts on currency, pointed out to members of the resolutions committee, when this matter was under advisement, that the Republicans had made a rather humorous mistake. The special power which the President still has, which would permit him to mark down the gold value of the dollar to one half its original value, along with the power to issue paper currency, or to adopt bimetalism, expires by limitation just a few days after inauguration!

So that, Senator Bulkley pointed out, to demand its repeal by a congress which does not come into power until a few days before that—nothing like sufficient time to put such an important measure through the house and senate—is rather in the nature of a futile gesture.

Even, the senator pointed out, in what Democrats regard as the unlikely contingency that the Republicans capture the Presidency and the house, there is no possible chance of their obtaining control of the senate for four more years. So even if there were a Republican landslide they could not repeal the provisions against the will of the Democrats.

Could Cut Dollar

During the months that remain before this power expires by limitation, in January, the President could if he wished do any of the three things authorized. He so far has taken advantage of only one of these powers. This was when he marked down the gold value of the dollar to 59.06 cents. So that, under the powers in this act, he could still mark it down to 50 cents of the original dollar. This would be considerably in excess of nine cents of the present dollar. It would be 9.06 cents of the original gold dollar. It would reduce the present dollar slightly more than 15 cents in its present gold value. Which would be immediately effective in making the dollar just that much less valuable in foreign exchange, hence making it that much easier to sell American goods abroad, and that much more expensive for Americans to buy foreign goods.

President Roosevelt, it so happens, has no present intention of exercising this power. There has been a firm conviction in Washington for some time that France would devalue the franc, and that then Britain would let the pound sterling drift down to equalize the French cut. As a matter of fact, there has been surprise in Washington that this has not occurred long since.

When and if this occurs the President will face a real problem as to whether to meet the change—so vastly important in foreign trade. But the best information obtainable is that he is not inclined to exercise his further power to devaluate the dollar even under this provocation.

Murray Causes Worry

"Alfalfa Bill" Murray of Oklahoma is really causing more concern among Democratic chieftains by his "walk" than is Alfred E Smith. Or James A. Reed. Or Bainbridge Colby. Or Joseph B. Ely. Or Judge Daniel F. Cohalan.

The answer is very simple. Elections are decided by electoral votes—not by the size of popular majorities in any particular states. A majority of 700, while a little nerve-racking when the returns are coming in, is just as good as 300,000 when the electoral votes are counted.

It so happens that the Democratic strategists do not regard the three states in which the "quintuplets" reside as doubtful. New York, the home of Al Smith, Colby and Judge Cohalan, they regard as "in the bag." Massachusetts, the home of former Governor Joseph B. Ely, they regard as a cinch on account of their confidence in Governor James M. Curley's oratory. Missouri, the home of Former Senator Reed, is conceded even by the Republicans as probably for Roosevelt. Naturally the Democrats are not worried about the "Show Me" state at all.

But Oklahoma is something else again. It is normally Democratic, but two factors are threatening to upset this normal alignment. One is the fact that, over a long period of years, Governor Alfred M. Landon, as an independent oil operator, has been building up friendships. As told in a recent dispatch, it was one of these friendships—that with Former Representative Charles Hamilton of Western New York, who went to Kansas to go in the oil business about 16 years ago—which was so potent in lining up the New York delegation for Landon.

In fact, it is the old friendships of Landon with men who happened to be influential in a number of eastern states that made the efforts of the "Old Guard" to stop Landon so futile.

Lehman Relents

The oil fields of Oklahoma happen to be mostly in the northern part of the state. Whereas it happens that the influence of "Alfalfa Bill" Murray is strongest in the southern part. Putting the two things together, friends of Landon who have been sizing up the situation are predicting he will carry the state by a very comfortable majority. Which would not worry the Democrats so much if the Republicans were not offering to bet on it!

This, plus the situation in Minnesota and North Dakota caused by the prospect that the Lemke-Coughlin-Townsend ticket will pull votes away from the New Deal, is the explanation of why there was such terrific pressure on Governor Herbert H. Lehman of New York to reconsider his determination not to run again for governor. The pressure proved successful.

The private view of many New York Democrats is that the state is fairly safe for Roosevelt if Lehman is on the ticket, and doubtful, if not swinging toward the Republican side, if Lehman is not on the ticket. If New York's 47 votes are safely in the Roosevelt column, there need be no worry in Janes A. Farley's office on election night about how Oklahoma goes. Or Minnesota. Or North Dakota.

With New York in the bag, even Illinois can take a walk.

SYNOPSIS

Jeb Braddon, young and fantastically successful broker of Chicago, is infatuated with Agnes Gleneith, beautiful daughter of a retired manufacturer. Rodney, a doctor, in love with Agnes, visits his brother, Jeb. Rod plans work at Rochester. Jeb suggests that he make a try for Agnes before leaving. In Rod there is a deeper, obstinate decency than in Jeb. Agnes believes to be happy, a girl must bind herself entirely to a man and have adorable babies. Rod visits Agnes and tells her of his great desire, but realizes it can never be fulfilled. Agnes' mother is attempting to regain her husband's love. Agnes has disturbing doubts as to what attracts her father in New York. Jeb tells Agnes he is going to marry her, and together they view an apartment in Chicago. Jeb asks Agnes to set an early date, but she tells him she cannot marry him. When the agent, Mr. Colver, offers to show them a furnished apartment, Jeb asks Agnes to see it alone, saying he must return to his office. Agnes consents and Jeb leaves. A radio is blaring terrifically from one of the apartments. Colver raps upon the door, which is opened by a scantily clad girl, who draws Agnes into the room. Colver finds her husband, Charles Lorrie, fatally shot. He calls the police. Myrtle Lorrie asks Agnes to phone Cathal O'Mara, a lawyer, to come at once. Agnes does.

CHAPTER II
—5—

"O'Mara's got to get me out of this! He can get me out," Mrs. Lorrie assured herself, "if he wants to! . . . You stand by me! I'm Myrtle—Myrtle Stiver Lorrie. You call me Myrtle! You're Agnes."

Agnes did not answer; she continued to step back away from the hands seeking her. She stared at the hands, white and soft and sensuous, and with scarlet stain on the nails; and she thought of one of those hands—the right one—holding a pistol, and that weak forefinger, with its scarlet stain, pulling the trigger once, twice—three times?

Some one rapped a demand for admittance upon the door; and Colver opened it.

Three men had come, none of them in uniform; but they were the police. They stepped in, instantly the door was opened.

The nearest man was the shortest of the three, but he was tall enough; he was straight and alert-looking and wiry. He was gray-eyed, and there was gray in his hair. Agnes had no need to be told that he was in command of the other two men, both bigger than he, and younger.

The last man in had quickly closed the door behind him, and he posted himself with his back against it; the other man advanced with his leader.

Agnes found that she had retreated, as they came in, or she had let Myrtle Lorrie pull her back to the center of the room; for she was standing there with Myrtle Lorrie's arms clasped tight about her.

These police in ordinary clothes were looking at her—at her and Myrtle Lorrie.

"You live here?" the gray man said to Myrtle. "You're the wife?"

But the wife did not answer; so Agnes did. "Yes, she lives here; she's the wife."

"Who are you?"

"I don't live here," said Agnes. "I just happened to come in."

"You mean you're a friend of hers?"

"No."

"How did you happen to come in?"

"I'll tell you," Colver now hurried to help her. "I'll tell you, Lieutenant Dolega. I was showing her, and the gentleman with her, some apartments! I had them upstairs; then the gentleman had to go; but she stayed. We heard the radio going in here; we knocked—"

Colver's quick, incoherent words ran over each other, and Lieutenant Dolega let him go on. At the end, he asked one question:

"Where is it?"

"Down there," said Colver; and Lieutenant Dolega and the other man moved away.

The man at the door had a notebook in his hand, and his pencil kept writing.

Lieutenant Dolega and his man, who had accompanied him, were walking very slowly. Would they never get there? Agnes pulsed with impatience. The calmness, the deliberation of these police in ordinary clothes, tantalized her. She watched them slowly proceed, studying the walls and the floor of the passage; when they were out of sight, she listened for some outcry such as Mr. Colver had made. But there was none.

They must have reached "it"—this girl's husband, shot and dead upon the floor. They had stopped and were stooping, probably, to see exactly what Myrtle Lorrie's soft, sensuous hand had done. How many times had she shot her husband?

That petty, particular curiosity strangely plagued Agnes. How long they had been married. How long had it been?

Agnes had to ask it, though she spoke in that awful silence. "How long were you married?" It came out in a whisper.

"Two years," Myrtle Lorrie whispered back. "My God, two years!"

From the bedroom there came no word nor voice of any sort—merely a succession of slight, rasping, mechanical sounds.

Myrtle Lorrie could stand this no longer. She dragged herself up until she supported herself on her own feet; and she screamed. She convulsed her arms tighter, but her scream gave Agnes strength to throw her off. Agnes was free, and she staggered off from her, shivering.

"O. K., Ulrich?" calmly inquired a voice from the bedroom.

"Go right ahead," replied Ulrich; but footsteps, which proved to be Dolega's, approached. At sight of him, Myrtle Lorrie stumbled backward and dropped into her big soft chair.

Some change glowed in Lieutenant Dolega's eyes; and his lips, when he spoke, moved less than before. His eyes noticed none of the others; from the moment he reappeared, he centered on Myrtle.

"Well," he said, "I saw what's done. Who did it?"

"I don't know! I don't know!"

"Were you here?"

"No; I came in! I tell you I came in!" she was shrieking now. "I came in; and there he was! Oh, my God, there he was!"

"So what did you do?"

"What?"

"What did you do! You took off your clothes and turned on the radio and sat here," Dolega supplied. He spoke, almost casually, to Colver.

"The pistol back there; did you pick it up?"

"Yes, sir; I saw there were four chambers discharged; then I put it back right where it was."

Dolega turned to Agnes. "Now I need your name."

Agnes gave it. If it meant anything to him, he did not betray the fact. "Where do you live?"

She told him.

"Who was you with when you came?"

Agnes shook her head; she would not tell. She was in this, but she would keep Jeb out. She was in no condition to appreciate that this was impossible.

There was a noise in the outer hall. Some one knocked in a sharp, commanding manner.

"Hello, Ulrich," Agnes heard in the silence which ensued when the door was opened.

Ulrich repeated a name which Agnes did not catch; and he admitted, with some deference, a man of medium height, self-confident and half bald. He was altogether different from the first three. He was whiter and softer of flesh and wore the marks of education along with his authority.

"Shut Up About Bert!" She Gasped, Barely Audibly.

"Mr. Nordell," Dolega called him, and said to her: "Mr. Nordell is an assistant state's attorney."

"Miss Gleneith—this is Miss Agnes Gleneith, Mr. Nordell—is a daughter of Robert C. Gleneith. She says, and he says"—Dolega jerked toward Colver—"that he was showing her a flat; and they just happened to come in here. It looks as if it might be so."

"It is so," said Agnes; but fear for herself had reached her at last.

"Ready to look at it?" Dolega asked the attorney.

Agnes' eyes followed Dolega's gray head and Mr. Nordell's round, bald spot at the crown of his head as they went to the bedroom. It was at this moment that she realized that they were not going to that room merely to see what was there, but that their purpose was to collect proof that Myrtle Lorrie had killed her husband, so that they could have her killed—have her life, in her turn, taken from her.

Her warm, soft, sensuous life that she loved so! Agnes gazed at her, huddled in her big chair, her sensations sweeping over her; she was frightened as she had not been before.

"When's he goin' to come?" she gasped at Agnes. "Oh, God, when's he goin' to come?"

"Who?" said Agnes. "Bert?" For suddenly she remembered Myrtle's cry into the phone: "Oh, God, Bert!" Who was Bert, and what was he to her?

Myrtle pinked from one of the hot flushes that swept her, and then went pale. "Shut up about Bert!" she gasped, barely audibly. "Where's that damn lawyer of mine?"

So it was not horror that swept her—horror at what she had done. That must have been in it, but chiefly it was fear, and her longing for life, for her own sensations to continue in her soft, warm body, no matter what she had done.

There was a new knock at the door. It was not loud; the man was not striking with his knuckles. He tapped with a finger-tip which said: "Take your choice: admit me or take the consequences."

Ulrich opened the door.

"I'm coming in, Ulrich."

Ulrich let him in; and his presence was like an alarm, calling Nordell and Dolega from the bedroom; and the fourth man (some one called him Jensen) followed them. So the three police in plain-clothes and the assistant state's attorney confronted the young man who had come in.

He was tall but not quite so tall as Jeb—and Rod. Why did Agnes' mind suddenly flee to them? Her thought caught them only in a flash of comparison; for this man was of their age, with some quality like Rod—or like Jeb; which was it? She was confused, responding to the new emotional tension.

The feeling of conflict filled the room. These men were antagonists—one against the four.

The one by himself stood easily, but on watch. He was not on guard; for to feel one on guard, you feel him thrown back into an attitude of defense. It was the four who confronted him who, you felt, were on guard; he was alone, but it was he who would, at the opportunity, strike.

Agnes did not begin to comprehend how her presence influenced everything that followed. It was her intrusion and the consequent involvement of Agnes Gleneith in the murder of Charles Lorrie that the case would turn upon. O'Mara had had nearly twenty minutes in which to appreciate that fact; and he had required not one—he had felt it immediately.

"You're quick on a case, O'Mara," incautiously Nordell cut at him. "If you were a surgeon, they couldn't call you an ambulance chaser. You leave it behind. Did you start from your office after or before the shooting?"

The tension in Agnes' feeling tightened. So these men not only were antagonists, but they had fought before, bitterly and without forgiveness on one side, at least.

She took sides; she could not help it. The man whom she had asked to come stood before the four and a little away from the wall. Whatever else he was, he was incomporable to any of them; his was the mold of another order of man. It had shaped his head so that your eyes lingered looking at him—lingered on the line of his good lips that he kept shut lest he speak too soon, on the cleft of his clean-cut chin, on his fine broad brow and his bold black hair. He held his head with a little lift that you liked.

He stepped unhindered past the police and to the center of the room, where Myrtle Lorrie clung to her refuge in her soft chair.

"I'm O'Mara," he said to her. "Did you ask for me?"

She caught his hand, but he disengaged it.

"Did you ask Miss Gleneith to send for me?"

"Yes. For God's sake, save me, save me!"

"I must find how things are. Meanwhile, you—" He spoke in a lower tone, swiftly, his voice continuing in definite, curt admonitions. But now Nordell and Dolega were beside him; there was a clash of words from which emerged a sudden truce.

"I'm taking you out of this," Martin O'Mara said to Agnes Gleneith, looking down at her. "Not all the way out, I'm sorry to say; we'll be long before being through with you. But we've no need to keep you here, distressing you, when so many more must soon be coming."

"Many more?" repeated Agnes, looking up at him.

"Faith," he said, "faith, they've barely begun to come."

How gentle he could be, this best damn lawyer in town who could face off four men and lay down his own conditions of truce with them!

The very way of his words was altered, when he spoke to her. No accent crept in; he spoke as before, but he let you feel, through the phrases that came to him unbidden, his closeness and accustom to plain people of ready emotion and sentiment, and simple speaking.

"One thing we'll be needing," he added. "It's him who came with you. You've not named him, I hear; but it's got to be. Who was he?"

"Mr. Braddon," said Agnes. "Jeb—Judson E. Braddon."

"You and he came here, I took it, not knowing these people."

"No."

"You came to look over these apartments, because you were marrying."

"Yes," said Agnes, "because we were marrying."

And this brought her back to that; she had come here considering the idea of marrying Jeb; that meant becoming his wife in rooms like these upstairs. . . . She could never, never move into such rooms now.

She looked at the girl in the big soft chair. "How could she do it?" she whispered her horror to O'Mara.

He shook his head. "When such a thing is done, you don't do it. No; you never do it," he said. "It's your dragons you have in you that drive you to it."

"Your dragons? What do you mean?"

"You know naught of them? . . . God has been good to you."

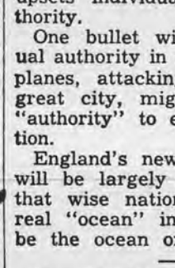
In Ancient Nile Mud
England Keeps Ready
Let the Dead Sleep
Murder Starts Early

Paris.—Reclining on her side, her body covered with gold, gold necklaces on her neck and on the ground nearby, archaeologists discover the well-preserved body of an Egyptian princess whose father, the Pharoah Chephren, built the second biggest pyramid; it was his brother, Cheops, who built the largest.



Arthur Brisbane

Those pyramids were tombs for kings, and searchers found the princess in one of them. The Nile mud seeping into the tomb had helped to preserve her.

That princess, living 5,000 years ago, could tell an interesting story for the movies. She "built herself a small pyramid with stones given to her by her many lovers." Where do you suppose she is now? In some strange Egyptian heaven, perhaps, with all those admirers around her.

England, alarmed by European war threats, issues an official "white paper" explaining why—

"The relation of our own armed forces to those of other great powers should be maintained at a figure high enough to enable us to exercise our influence and authority in international affairs."

Unfortunately for all plans, the airplane in the hands of a desperate nation might upset all national "authority," just as a pistol in the hands of a desperate man upsets individual and police authority.

One bullet will stretch individual authority in the dust; 1,000 airplanes, attacking the heart of a great city, might cause national "authority" to end in demoralization.

England's new defense increase will be largely in her air force; that wise nation knows that the real "ocean" in future wars will be the ocean of the air.

In a desert of southeastern Utah, men and women, belonging to the cult of "truth seekers," were gathered around the body of Mrs. Edith Dakhal, who died more than a year ago. You read about it, perhaps.

Mrs. Ogden, leader of the "truth seekers," prayed over the body, which appeared marvelously preserved. The "truth seekers" believe they will bring the woman back to life, but the pathetic fact is that it would not in the least matter if they did.

The important thing is to improve the condition of 1,800,000,000 actually living on the earth. For one safely out of it to be brought back would be unimportant, in these days, and perhaps cruel.

America holds the world's "murder championship" for all kinds of murder, at all ages—quantity, quality, variety, volume.

A New Jersey boy, 16 years old, was sentenced to death.

In Wisconsin, a coroner reports that little David Holl, two months old, was killed by two boys four and three years of age.

They each held one hand of the younger one, and dropped it on the floor. It cried and would not stop. Then, one of the small boys explained, "We pounded him." These youngest "killers" puzzle the law. You can't "try" a four-year-old child.

Railroads tell the interstate commerce commission they would like fares reduced to two and a half cents a mile, instead of two cents. The railroads should have all possible consideration, for they have built up this country, but at two and a half cents a mile they will not compete successfully with automobiles carrying passengers for one-quarter of a cent a mile.

New York proposes to fingerprint everybody, new babies included. The baby of the future will be busy, with finger-printing, tonsil and appendix removal, vaccination for smallpox and a half dozen other diseases.

The new treaty with France, reducing the duty on French wines and liquors by 50 per cent, interests California and other wine growing states. It should persuade them to stabilize the production of wines, establish official guarantees of purity, freedom from adulterations, mixtures, and especially "fortifying" with alcohol.

In Europe, notably in France, adulteration of wines is an offense against the law. With us, it is a business.

For advertising reasons, a group of men made a long distance hike on a diet of broken grain to prove the superiority of that diet. They were surprised when 53 hikers showed a total loss of 211 pounds in weight, while one, 66 years old, showed a gain of three pounds.

They Say Roosevelt Is Not A Democrat

They say Franklin D. Roosevelt is not a Democrat. They say the Democratic Party is no longer the Democratic Party.

They say Mr. Roosevelt is any one of a number of things, depending on who is doing the saying and on how strongly he objects to the President's policies and actions. But mostly they say he is a Socialist. Some even say he is a dictator—or wants to be one.

Likewise they variously describe the Democratic Party. But mostly those who do the condemnatory describing simply put it down as "the New Deal Party," as something not Democratic and not anything else that was ever known to politics in this country.

And they mourn and sigh for the Democratic Party of old—the "party of Jefferson and Jackson and Cleveland and Wilson"—as if that party had been the same under all these men and through these times.

"They," of course, means all those who object to the New Deal. Chief among them it is hardly surprising to note, are the Republicans and what a spectacle it is to see Republicans weeping for the Democratic Party! Next to the Republicans are the Liberty Leaguers among those who decry the "passing" of the Democratic Party. And there are a relative few who have always been Democrats, but who now find themselves out of sympathy with their party, and who join the Republicans and the Liberty Leaguers in yearning for the Democratic Party of old.

What is the Democratic Party? What was this "Democratic Party of old?"

Those who have read deeper into history than mere dates and names and events, those who know anything about American political history, know that the Democratic party has always been what the Democrats of a given period have made it. And they know that, as times and conditions have changed from period to period throughout our history, the Democratic Pary has changed to meet these conditions and the needs of the times.

It is easy to speak of the Democratic Party of Jefferson and Jackson in one breath and of the party of Cleveland and Wilson in another; or even of the party of all four in the same breath. But to speak thus is merely to be rhetorical. Actually such phrases have no meaning—unless it be that the Democratic Party has necessarily evolved and changed, and that the periods represented by each of these names were Successive stages of the party's evolution.

Jeffersonian Democracy was one thing; Jacksonian Democracy was another and a decidely different thing. It was a far cry from the "age of Jefferson" to the "reign of Andrew Jackson." After Jackson and up until the War Between the States, the Democratic Party became steadily a vastly different party from what it was under "Old Hickory."

Then came William Jennings Bryan, and in 1896 he became the dominant influence in the Democratic Party, an influence which was to last until 1912. The Democratic Party under the leadership of Bryan represented an almost complete reversal from what it had been under Cleveland. And naturally, there were those in Bryan's day who said the Democratic Party was no longer the Democratic party. Yet we know that it was; that the party was but passing through another stage in its evolution; that it was the Democratic Party because it was what the great majority of the Democrats of that time made it.

Then came Woodrow Wilson in 1912, and again there was a change. Wilson and the Democrats of his time took something from Jefferson, something from Jackson, something from Cleveland, something from Bryan, and added something of their own. But the Democratic Party under Wilson's leadership was not the Democratic Party of any of these others.

There has been, through the decades, a process of trial and error by the Democratic Party. If the party has at one time gone wrong, time has subsequently righted it. If the Party today goes wrong in any particular, we know that time will bring a redirection. But no party can endure if it does not change to meet the conditions and needs of the times; and the Democratic party has endured as the oldest American political party because it has continued to evolve.

Today we have new conditions and new needs. Under Mr. Roosevelt the party is meeting those needs and conditions as the great majority of Democrats think best. The Democratic party of today is still the Democratic party because it is what the Democrats of our time have made it. If it were not for that, the Democratic Party would not be DEMOCRATIC. Franklin D. Roosevelt is the Democratic leader because he represents what the Democrats of our day stand for and desire.

The party is still the Democratic Party, and Roosevelt as its leader is a Democrat, not merely by virtue of his leadership, but because he meets what is, in the last analysis, the TEST of a Democrat—one who believes in and upholds popular government and the will of the majority, within the framework and under the safeguards of our constitution.

DAME RUMOR

The story is told of a woman who freely used her tongue to start rumors and to start evil reports on others. She made confession to the priest of what she had done. He gave her a ripe thistle top, and told her to go out in various directions and scatter the seeds one by one.

Wondering at the penance, she obeyed, and then returned and told her confessor. To her amazement, he bade her go back and gather the scattered seeds; and when she objected that it would be impossible, he replied that it would be still more difficult to gather up and destroy all the false rumors she had circulated about others.

Any thoghtless, carless child can scatter a handful of thistle seeds before the wind in a moment; but the strongest, and wisest man can never gather them again.

THE REV. AND MRS. D. Z. WOOLEY HONORED

Upon arriving the guests were served punch by the Y. W. A. girls. Games were enjoyed under the direction of Miss Eleanor Atchinson and several vocal trios were beautifully rendered by Misses Ellen Ruth Isbell, Nancy Wooley and Aubrey John Williams, after which delicious brick ice cream and cake were served by the charming Y. W. A. girls. The group then joined hands and sang "Blessed Be the Tie That Binds", followed by the pastor's benediction.

The many lovely gifts received bear testimony of the high esteem and love felt for Bro. Wooley, Mrs. Wooley and family. Mrs. Wooley received as a special gift fro mthe Phaelathia Class which she has taught, a beautiful purse. Bro. Wooley has been a faithful and beloved pastor of the Baptist Church here for seven years. He has been ably assisted by Mrs. Wooley and family. The prayers and good wishes of the Church not unmingled with regret, will follow them to their new home in Eclectic.

It takes money to run a newspaper and there are a number of delinquent subscribers on our list which we would like to keep. However, unless we hear something definite from you next week, we shall have to discontinue! Won't you let us hear from you?

Have you read "GONE WITH THE WIND"? The most widely discussed novel the South has produced—written by Margaret Mitchell of Atlanta? We recommend his book for the Culture Club Library. Of course, you have read Joseph Mudd's "Old Boat Rocker"--Politicians are still laughing over this clever literary exposition on the New Deal. Mr. Mudd maintains a summer home near Montevallo, hence Shelby County feels an especial pride in the national success this novel has enjoyed.

Miss Ellen Ruth Isbell entertained at the home of her parents on Tuesday night with an informal party.

Those enjoying this courtesy were: Misses Aubrey John Williams, Nancy Wooley, Eloise Lester, Ruth Mize of Maplesville, and Mrs. Adell Stinson. Messrs. Ross Bob Mullins, Oscar Martin, Powell Blair and Barney Isbell. Cake and Ice Cream was enjoyed by this group during the evening.

Of cordial interest to a wide circle of friends in Shelby County, and especially Columbiana, is the announcement of the approaching weddings of Katie Lou Chapman of Dadeville, to William McCall of Savannah, Georgia, the marriage to be celebrated on August 7th in the Bapist Church in Dadeville, and the wedding of Christine Moody of Sylacauga, to Frank Ellis of Columbiana, the wedding to be solemnized in August in Sylacauga. Miss Chapman is the youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Chapman, former residents, whose talents and charm have endeared her a wide circle of friends throughout the County. Frank Ellis is the son of Mr. and Mrs. L. H. Ellis, and Miss Moody is a frequent visitor in Columbiana where she has many friends, who will be delighted to claim her for a future permanent resident.

One of the most enthusiastic base ball fans in Shelby County is Dr. D. S. Lightcap, who journeys to the Magic City each Sunday afternoon to follow the career of the "Barons" Eighty years young and an ardent sportsman who never misses a chance to watch the willow stick connect with the little horse hide pellet. "Pep' plus "brains" plus "physical fitness" makes the Doctor a popular comrade and the "boys" he runs around with tell me he is the best sport in the crowd.

Dr. and Mrs. E. B. Cooper are now at home to their many friends in Columbiana in their apartment at the home of Mrs. Pauline Bird.

Mr. and Mrs. William Teague, after a weeks vacation spent with Mrs. Rosa Teague, have returned to their home in Kingsport, Tennessee, where Mr. Teague is employed as chemist for the Eastman Company.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Baker, of Washington, D. C., stopped over in Columbiana for the week end, the guests of their aunt, Mrs. Dixie Shealy. Mr. and Mrs. Baker are vacationing and are on their way to the Texas Centennial and other interesting points West. Dr. and Mrs. Hugh Nickson and two children, Carolyn and Hugh Jr., have returned to their home in Columbiana, after spending the summer months in Nashville, where Dr. Nickson has been pursuing further study in special Health Work in Tennessee.

Britain Will Help Citizens to Combat Poison Gas Attacks

Every English Home May Be Gas-Proof Dugout

GAS-ATTACK by air, the Fifth Horseman of the Apocalypse of modern war, is at last disturbing Great Britain, whose people hitherto have displayed characteristic native phlegm in the face of feverish preparations in continental cities for civilian protection during possible air raids. Every Englishman's house, traditionally his castle, may now have to become his gas-proof dugout.

Detailed suggestions for rendering rooms in ordinary dwellings gas-proof have been drawn up by a trained professional, C. E. Bower, who is styled Air Raid Precautions Officer to the Commissary of No. 1 District, St. John Ambulance Brigade.

To get his directions widest possible publicity, with graphic pictures of important details which might be overlooked if given only in print, they have been published in the Illustrated London News. An official booklet is announced for publication shortly, by the home office.

How to Fight Gas.

The ordinary English urban or suburban villa presents a rather difficult problem. Its one floor, at ground level, lies within the expected "zone of saturation," if a gas raid comes. It has no basement, and there are numerous openings through which gas might enter—notably the open fireplaces which are features of almost every room in an ordinary English house.

Yet the problem can be solved, Mr. Bower declares. Select one or more rooms, enough to give each occupant 20 square feet of floor space, with a ceiling height of about nine feet. Putty all window joints, paste paper on the inside of the windows, and board up the outside. Finally, fasten a wet blanket inside the window. Do the same for the doors, and seal up the fireplace, and all other openings.

See that the room is always provisioned with food and water, and furnished with folding camp beds and bedding in addition to necessary chairs and tables. Have fire extinguishers and a first-aid kit available. Provide means for passing the time—books, radio, phonograph, playing cards.

Ancient Syrian God Found on Euphrates

NEW HAVEN, CONN.—The calm, bearded face of an ancient Syrian god—Hadad the Thunderer—and an elaborate temple built for his worship, have been discovered in ruins of Dura on the Euphrates.

Yale scientists, pronouncing latest buildings uncovered at Dura "sensational finds," said that the temple of Hadad contains a high altar built like a miniature Tower of Babel. The high altar, standing within a court, is about 17 feet square and 16 feet tall, and is approached by a flight of steps. An altar of burnt offerings in the principal sanctuary and the throne of the high-priest before it have been preserved through the centuries.

Hadad was a god of storms, whose name is familiar to Bible students because three kings in the Bible had names in which this heathen god's name formed a part.

The discoveries at Dura include the headquarters of the governor or duke of the Euphrates frontier in Roman empire days. The vast complex of the building included offices, barracks for body-guard, and living quarters with elaborately painted walls and ceilings.

In one guard room, the archaeologists have found on the wall the opening lines of Virgil's Aeneid scrawled by a Roman soldier. A living-room has yielded a magnificent oval brooch of gold four inches across, ornamented in filigree and set with garnets and emeralds.

The palace of the hereditary mayors of the city, also revealed, contains over 40 rooms and two great courtyards.

Odor of New Cut Wood May Be Made Perfume

LONDON.—Perfumes of a rustic tang, bearing such rural names as "Odor of Earth," "New-Cut Wood," or perhaps going across the Channel into "Terre sillonnee," are made a possibility by the discovery of special micro-organisms that are responsible for the characteristic scents of fresh-plowed fields in spring, of earth after strong rain in summer, or of freshly felled trees. The micro-organisms were discovered by Dr. A Raistrick, working at the Rothamsted Experimental station at Harpenden.

Matron's Dress with Vestee

Pattern No. 1907-B

This dress designed with soft capelet sleeves and a contrasting vestee is one of those perennial styles. It is always a pleasure to show by popular request. They're so universally becoming to larger and more mature women, and so adaptable to conventional occasions.

The model shown is a clever street frock which takes into consideration the fitting problem encountered by many women whose tastes incline toward conservative rather than complicated dressmaking. The lines are studied to give slenderness without sacrificing a trim and neat appearance, exemplified in the beautiful pointed up bodice, expecially graceful and smart. Sheer cotton, prints and chiffons are delightful for town or country.

Barbara Bell Pattern No. 1907-B is available for sizes: 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, 46, 48 and 50. Size 36 requires 4¾ yards of 39 inch material. Send 15 cents in coins.

Beach Togs Tell New Fabric Trends

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

IT IS not enough that beach outfits and active sports clothes be stylish and pleasing to the eye. It is not enough that they be merely practical and utilitarian. To qualify 100 per cent to the good your sun, sand and surf and your general outdoor play-around togs must be every whit as practical as they are chic and eye-appealing.

The cunning bathing and beach suit of gay print shown to the right in the picture is just that—thoroughly as practical as it is charming to look upon. Its claim to practicality is due to the fact that the sanforized-shrunk cotton of which it is made carries the promise of non-shrinking no matter how often it may happen to be water soaked. This very modern way of processing cottons and linens so that they cannot shrink insures your bathing wardrobe all season long, which, of course, means no-end satisfaction in the final analysis of clothes logic.

Practical from another point of view, too, is this charming beach and swim ensemble, in that it is one of the very new and goodlooking halter bathing suits with wrap-around skirt to tie on when you go meandering down the beach as fair maidens are wont to do.

Another story of achievement in the way of combining the practical with the highly chic and attractive in sports clothes is told in the new weight-controlling ensemble that allows one to lounge about the house, play ping-pong and go about home duties while accomplishing the magic of shelving the extra poundage one longs to discard preparatory to getting one's self into shape for that svelte lithe appearance in one's bathing and beach suit. This miracle-working avoirdupois reducer is pictured in the foreground. A smart gym gob suit it is, made of an exceedingly good-looking crepe-texture rubber that keeps the pores of the body open and encourages a healthy perspiration. When that happens you can start making your swimming dates for to your glee and satisfaction the pounds will begin to roll off until normal weight is reached. These crepe-textured rubber gym gobs are styled in three comfortable pieces—slacks, shorts and shirt.

Big news and no doubt about it, is the beach and swimming suit in the new and startling front page newspaper print cotton. See it pictured to the left in the group. Prints this season are noted for novelty and certainly this newspaper-print cotton captures first honors in that respect. The fitted halter top which is lined with white wool jersey for extra comfort and proper contour, buttons at the front to the waistband of the one-piece wool-lined skirt and maillot. The separate cape has an attached hood and is lined with terry cloth throughout.

Very smart beach outfits of white pique are among the season's latest models. A stylish ensemble includes shorts, worn under a one-piece tunic that fastens all the way down the front (may be left open at will) with pique-covered buttons. A big floppy white fabric hat is worn.

Another interesting item is the hat made of pique that is nothing more than a brim which ties at the back. It is without crown and can be untied and flattened out to be washed and ironed.

CHIC FOR SUMMER

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

According to the modern way of thinking a costume is only as smart and correct and goodlooking as the accessories worn with it. In other words it is the accessories that make the costume and this is the challenge that fashionables must meet these times. In the matter of observing the little niceties of accessory details the lady in the picture is costumed to perfection. Her exquisitely ladylike straw hat is an exponent of smartest millinery fashion. The fur that borders the sleeves of her jewel-clasped crepe frock carries a convincing message in regard to the importance of "summer furs" in the mode. Her long simple slip-on suede gloves are eminently correct. As to the handsome bag she carries it is the accent supreme of chic.

Polka Dots in Style.

Mannish little polka dotted silk cravats and belts are worn with soft frocks and polka dot scarfs walk out with sports coats.

FEATHERS IN STYLE FOR HAT TRIMMING

Feathers are becoming more and more important as trimming for hats, according to Erik Braagaard, the young Danish milliner whose recently established Paris house has had unusual success.

Braagaard even makes entire hats and headdresses of feathers. He takes a single yellow bird of paradise and curves it cleverly about the head holding it in position with double bands of black velvet that cross the back of the head. This hat designer is building crowns higher and higher for morning and sports wear. The conical or thimble crowns, likewise are featured on some of the afternoon hats while others are trimmed with bunches of fruit or flowers.

Late Offerings of Prints Copy Design of Wall Paper

Some of the new prints look like wallpaper designs. Vertical stripes of flowers, massed together, are printed on pastel colored backgrounds. Other materials are printed with enormous sprays of flowers or vines in conventional wallpaper patterns. One house has applied a leaf and vine design in black organdy on a dinner dress of white organdy. The veins in the black organdy leaves are etched in shiny black beads.

Bracelets Combine Both Real Beauty and Utility

Since costume jewelry has come rushing back into style, there are all sorts of new bracelets on the market. For evening wear there are wide bands of gold or silver set with large, square precious stones. The largest center stone opens up to reveal a miniature powder compact and puff, while the stones on either side open to show paste rouge and eye shadow. The clasps of the new bracelets are small lipsticks.

Lesson for July 19

SOCIAL SERVICE IN THE EARLY CHURCH

LESSON TEXT — Acts 4:32-35; II Corinthians 8:1-9.

GOLDEN TEXT—He said: "It is more blessed to give than to receive."—Acts 20:35.

PRIMARY TOPIC—How Jesus' Friends Shared.

JUNIOR TOPIC—When Christians See Others in Need.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Christians Sharing With Others.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Christians and Social Service.

Social service in the early Church was a by-product of the gospel and not the gospel itself. Those who are saved by the gospel will show their concern for their fellows, especially those who are fellow members of the body of Christ.

I. Characteristics of the Primitive Church (Acts 4:31-35).

1. It was a praying church (v. 31). The early Christians for every want and need betook themselves to God in prayer. Their faith caused them to go to the living God, believing that their needs would be supplied.

2. The Spirit-filled church (v. 31). When they prayed, the place was shaken wherein they were gathered together and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit.

3. It was a church which had great boldness in preaching the Word of God (v. 31). The ministers of the Spirit-filled church will not offer any apology for the Bible, but will preach it.

4. It was a united church (v. 32). They were all of one heart and soul.

5. It was a generous church (v. 32). They held nothing back from those who had need. The needs were supplied from a common fund. This was not Communism any more than when the church today helps from a common fund those who have need.

6. The ministers had a powerful testimony (v. 33).

7 It was a church whose members possessed unblemished character (v. 33). Great grace was upon them all.

II. Generous Act of Barnabas (Acts 4:36, 37).

He sold a piece of land and turned over all the proceeds to be used for those in need. It is not said that Barnabas sold all the land he had. His act, therefore, cannot in any real sense be used as a precedent for a community of goods in the church.

III. Stephen the Deacon (Acts 6:1-8).

As soon as the church had relief from external troubles, difficulties arose within. Up to this time it would seem that the problems of the church were in the hands of the apostles. A congregational meeting was called, the case placed before the church, and the church instructed to select seven men of good reputation and Spirit-filled, to administer the temporalities, giving the apostles time for prayer and the ministry of God's Word. Among the seven deacons thus chosen, Stephen had first place. While engaged in his duties as a deacon, he sprang into the light as an eloquent and powerful preacher.

IV. The Good Deeds of Dorcas (Acts 9:36-43).

Dorcas was a practical Christian woman. She was full of good works and almsdeeds which she did, not what she talked of doing. Her death was a real loss. If all professing Christian women would use their needles as Dorcas did, there would be more real testimony for Christ.

V. Christian Stewardship (II Cor. 8:1-9).

1. Examples of true Christian benevolence (vv. 1-5). The liberality of these Macedonian churches exhibits practically every principle and motive entering into Christian giving.

a. The source of true giving (v. 1). is said to be the grace of God.

b. They gave from the depths of their poverty (v. 2).

c. Their willingness surpassed their ability (v. 3).

d. They were insistent on being allowed the privilege of giving (v. 4).

e. They first gave themselves to the Lord (v. 5).

2. Emulation of Macedonian benevolence urged (vv. 6-15).

a. Not as a command (v. 8). Acceptable giving must be spontaneous.

b. As proof of the sincerity of love (v. 8). Sincere love is benevolent action toward the object loved.

c. As the completion and harmony of Christian character (v. 7).

d. The self-sacrificing example of Christ (v. 9).

e. The true principle upon which gifts are acceptable to God (vv. 10-12). The motive of the giver determines the value of the gift.

f. Every Christian should give something (vv. 13-15).

Philosophy of Bacon

"While a little philosophy leads away from religion, much philosophy leads back to it." The man who said this was not an outsider, but a philosopher of the philosophers—Francis Bacon—the one, indeed, on whose inductive philosophy all the science of our modern world is built.

Waste of Life

The true waste of life consists in the love we have not given, the service we have not rendered, the sacrifice from which we have drawn back.

Cherry Pie Made From Home Canned Cherries Cannot Be Beat

It's Time to Preserve Your Quota of the Delectable Fruit.

By Zella Hale Weyant

If you are lucky enough to have a few cherry trees of your own, or if not as you shop in the market or drive in the country we know you have watched the arrival of the cherries. Something about their bright red color and tart flavor appeals to all of us.

Cherries belong in the acid group of foods and are very easily canned. They may be canned with or without pits. However, most homemakers prefer to pit them because they lend themselves to a greater variety of ways in which they may be served. And now for a small amount a cherry pitting machine may be purchased. The cherries should be stemmed and washed before pitting so that none of the good juices of the cherries are lost during the pitting process.

Because of their acid content the color and flavor of the canned cherries will be better if they are processed in the hot water bath, and in order to carry the canning procedure through without delay, it is always best to assemble the canning equipment before the work on the fruit is begun. See that all the necessary pans, knives, spoons, to be used in cleaning and preparing the cherries are clean and ready to be used. Have the water bath canner on the stove and enough water in it to cover the jars at least one inch over the top. The water in the canner should be near the boiling point before the jars are placed into it for processing.

Also collect and inspect the jars and caps that are needed for the canning. Be sure the jars are free from nicks, cracks and sharp edges that would prevent a seal. Remember to have a sufficient amount of jars and caps on hand to complete the canning. The two-piece "self-sealing" caps will require a new lid and the screw top caps a new rubber ring. And again we present the simple rules for correct use of each type of jar cap: When using the two-piece "self-sealing" cap, place lid on jar with sealing composition next to the glass and screw the band firmly tight. If using the wire-clamp glass lid jar, place glass lid and rubber ring on jar and put the upper bail in position across the glass lid. If using the zinc top cap, place rubber ring on jar and screw the cap down, then turn back quarter inch. On the jars using the rubber rings, the seal is completed as soon as the jars are removed from the canner. The self-sealing can requires no further adjusting at the end of the processing period, but is simply removed from the canner and set right side up to cool.

Here are a few tested recipes:

Cherry Preserves

10 pounds cherries 8 pounds sugar

Wash and pit the cherries. Add the sugar. Boil until the liquid is of the desired consistency. Pour into sterilized jars and seal.

Cherry Conserve

8 cups cherries 3 cups water
2 cups seedless raisins Sugar

Remove the pits from cherries and cut raisins in pieces. Add water and boil 30 minutes. To each cup pulp add one cup sugar. Cook until thick. Pour into sterilized jars and seal.

Cherries (Cold Pack)

Wash, stem, pit if desired. Pack into clean jars to within half inch of the top. Fill to within one and a half inches of the top with a medium sirup (made of two parts water to one part sugar) or if desired a heavier sirup may be used. Process in water bath for 20 minutes.

THERE is a reason why Louis Meyer won the 500-mile Indianapolis race this year—and why he is the only man ever to win this gruelling race three times. He always used Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires, and never experienced tire trouble of any kind.

Louis Meyer knows tire construction. He also knows that to drive for 500 consecutive miles over this hot brick track, negotiating the dangerous curves 800 times at the record-breaking average speed of 109 miles an hour, requires tires of super strength and greatest blowout protection, as a blowout on any one of the dangerous curves would likely mean instant death. By the Firestone patented Gum-Dipping process every cord in the tires on Louis Meyer's car was soaked and coated with liquid rubber, thereby preventing internal friction and heat. This is the secret of the extra strength and reserve safety built into Firestone Tires.

You of course will not drive 109 miles per hour, but at today's higher speeds you do need tires that will give you greatest blowout protection and will stop your car up to 25% quicker. Take no chances! Let your Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store or Firestone Dealer equip your car with Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires, the safest tires built. It costs so little to protect lives worth so much!

BOY SCOUTS

By WILLIE THOMASON,
Editor, Siluria, Ala.

From time to time Patrols are called on to present some sort of special program which they are supposed to have had experience in conducting. Frequently, yes, very frequently, they have to go through any number of practices which are entirely new to them in order to present the desired program.

Of course, as far as he public is concerned, it is all right with them. And as long as you are able to give them what they wanted and expected it should be all right with them. But that is not the thing about it, As far as any good Scout Troop is concerned, it is not all right.

Any group of boys, when properly organized, could have done it just as good. The thing those people had in mind when they ask you to do it for them, was the fact that you were a reliable group of boys and could be depended upon.

The thing a good Troop should have in mind is that they are "Prepared" and thoroughly familiar with the conducting of that particular type of program. They should have had enough practice along these lines to be able to present the program within a moments notice. That is, with possibly one rehearsal.

By this, I do not mean that we are able to go through with any sort of program. A program that has noth ing to do with Scou work would have to be practiced, of course. Things, such as Flag raising ceremonies, First Aid Demonstrations and Signaling is what I am refering to.

In other words, I am trying to tell you that we should practice these things as often as possible so that we will not be caught napping and remember the Knights Motto, "Be Always Ready" or our own Motto, "Be Prepared."

You might include marching in this series of practices. Occasionally Scouts are called on, even in small towns, like these in Shelby County, tolead parades. So you see, if you are "Prepared" you can make quite a colorful event of the occasion.

Have you ever watched an Army truck loaded with soldiers drive up, stop and within a minute be unload? ed? Those soldiers no quicker touch the ground until they are all lined up, spick and span ready to be dismissed. They didn't have to be told to line up, they had practiced that time after time and knew what to do and could do it in a fraction of a minute.

Boy Scouts do not participate in any form of Military training unless you could call marching this kind of training. Since Scouts are called upon to take part in numerous parades this becomes an essential and we practice this with no thought of Military training.

Lets make it our business to not only study the things that we should be able to do but to actually learn to do them. Practice and practice and then practice some more until we are absolutely positive that we know how to do these things and then do them correctly.

Nothing any organization has ever done has ever been more colorful and put on with any better accuracy and promptness than the things some of the Boy Scouts of our Country has done. We can continue to do things as we have done in the past not for ourselves but for our fellow man.

Of course, we will run into snags and things to pull against us, but if we just keep on the up and up, we will continue to come out ahead of the obstacles.

Did you ever catch a cat by the tail and just hold its tail without any pulling moion tand see how hard the cat would pull? Thats the way we want to do these obstacles. When the cat pulls it hurts him, not us. So let's just sit tight and hold our own and let the old drawback pull until his heart is contented and his tail dislocated and he will finally give up and we win again.

With an earnest desire and a whole hearted effort to do things instead of just studying them we close with a "BE ALWAYS READY," and a "BE PREPARED."

SYNOPSIS

Jeb Braddon, young and fantastically successful broker of Chicago, is infatuated with Agnes Gleneith, beautiful daughter of a retired manufacturer. Rodney, a doctor, in love with Agnes, visits his brother, Jeb. Rod plans work at Rochester. Jeb suggests that he make a try for Agnes before leaving. In Rod there is a deeper, obstinate decency than in Jeb. Agnes believes to be happy, a girl must bind herself entirely to a man and have adorable babies. Rod visits Agnes and tells her of his great desire, but realizes it can never be fulfilled. Agnes' mother is attempting to regain her husband's love. Agnes has disturbing doubts as to what attracts her father in New York. Jeb tells Agnes he is going to marry her, and together they view an apartment in Chicago. Jeb asks Agnes to set an early date, but she tells him she cannot marry him. When the agent, Mr. Colver, offers to show them a furnished apartment, Jeb asks Agnes to see it alone, saying he must return to his office. Agnes consents and Jeb leaves. A radio is blaring terrifically from one of the apartments. Colver raps upon the door, which is opened by a scantily clad girl, who draws Agnes into the room. Colver finds her husband, Charles Lorrie, fatally shot. He calls the police. Myrtle Lorrie asks Agnes to phone Cathal O'Mara, a lawyer, to come at once. Agnes does. The police take charge. O'Mara arrives. The officers are antagonistic to him. Agnes sides with O'Mara.

Agnes was out; she had passed that door; but the room and the apartment inside it refused to be obliterated. It went with her; they all seemed to travel with her, though she only had been released, she alone had been helped away.

She sat for a few minutes in the women's waiting-room of the Northwestern railroad station, where no one could know that she, this afternoon, had walked in on a murder. After a while, she went to a phone-booth and called her father's office. He was not there, but his secretary grew almost hysterical when she recognized Agnes' voice.

"Where are you, Miss Agnes?"

"At the station; I'm taking a train home in seven minutes." The police had communicated with her father, and he had gone to find her.

Finally she called Jeb; but he also was out seeking her. For news of the murder of Charles Lorrie was on the air; the announcer had said that Miss Agnes Gleneith had discovered the murder.

The wife of a man in Jeb's office had picked this up at home not ten minutes ago, and had phoned her husband in the office; and Jeb had set out.

Agnes sat in the train where nobody knew. Nobody—yet. But by night they would know; by morning all her world would learn that she had "walked in" on a murder while she had been looking for an apartment with Jeb Braddon.

That meant, of course, that she was to marry Jeb. Marry, marry, marry, the rails ran again under the car wheels.

She had selected a seat amid strangers; she leaned her head against the window and shut her eyes.

See. You opened your eyes, but that room was there; Myrtle was there, reaching for her, clinging to her, forever clinging. "It" was down the hall, half in the bedroom; the husband whom Myrtle had shot, four times, after being his wife for two years.

Agnes closed her eyes again.

Who was Bert, and where was he? Myrtle's Bert.

"Shut up about Bert!" Myrtle had begged. And Agnes had omitted mention of him. Why?

For the sake of Myrtle? Or of Martin O'Mara?

What did Martin O'Mara mean by saying "you" never do a thing like that, but your dragons drove you to it? What were the dragons, which Myrtle's soft sensuousness might have known, but which Agnes knew naught of, because God had been good to her?

The train was stopped again, and it was at her station. There were her mother and Bee, and Simmons behind them. Her father, it proved, had phoned to them from the city to meet this train. They hurried her home, where her mother, after learning all that Agnes could tell, offered to start her off the next morning for the East and for Europe.

"Your Aunt Esther will take you. I'll telephone her this evening." Aunt Esther was her mother's older sister, a widow living in Hartford. "I'd go with you myself, Agnes; but it is no time to leave your father."

"No," said Agnes. "But I can't possibly leave, Mother."

"Why not?"

"I'm a witness. I must appear before the coroner's jury tomorrow, probably; then before the Grand Jury; and then at the trial."

"I can't imagine it!" her mother said.

"But I have to."

Jeb arrived before her father; he had driven again from the city. Agnes had him come to her room, where she remained.

Jeb crossed the room in long, strong strides and seized her in his arms.

She said no word but she pushed away from him.

"What's the matter, Glen?" he overpowered her again. "I love you so; and I left you to walk into that—when I love you so!"

"Love?" Agnes repeated as much to herself as to him, looking up at him. "Do we love, Jeb? . . . Or what is it we feel for each other?"

He held her only tighter. "I know," he said. "You're mixing us up with them. Don't! . . Oh, I wish to God I'd stayed there with you."

"You didn't, Jeb . . . I'm glad."

It was nearly midnight, and after Jeb was gone, when she had a talk with her mother and father.

"You're not to blame, Agnes, little Light One," he repeated, petting her hair. "It was bad luck; that's all. But why in the world did you phone for that lawyer?"

"O'Mara?" said Agnes.

"I wish you hadn't done it."

"Why?"

"It aligns you with her—and him."

"Does it?"

"She won't go away," her mother returned to her own remedy in the emergency. "She insists that she can't leave at all."

"That's true," said her father.

"At least," said her mother, "you'll not go back to New York tomorrow, Bob?"

"Were you going tomorrow, Father?"

He looked at his daughter, who had walked in on a murder that afternoon. "Yes," he said.

"Why?" she asked him, as never she would have before.

"Business, of course, Light One."

What was Father doing in New York? How could he do it? He, who had been so happy with Mother—so completely happy — during all those eleven years in the house on Easter Lane. But they were passed—as two years had passed in that apartment which she had visited, where Myrtle had shot her husband. How could she have done it?

She didn't do it; not the bride who had married him two years ago and once had been happy with him. Father—Father, who had brought Mother as a bride to the house on Easter Lane—that father was not doing what Father was doing against Mother today.

"When such a thing is done, you don't do it," Martin O'Mara had told her. "It's your dragons you have in you that drive you."

Were the dragons of desire that fed on Myrtle's soft sensuousness, also afflicting Father?

Agnes lay long awake. If she could, by willing it, obliterate her hours in the apartment so that never they could touch her again, would she do it?

No, she knew. No. Who, having passed from innocence, would return to it again? Who, having encountered him, would obliterate from all her life ahead, Martin O'Mara?

Who was he? Who—what wife or what other woman—might now be awaiting him?

Twenty miles away in the city a woman was awaiting him at that hour, though it was long after midnight. She was at a window beside the door of a little frame house, and she watched out with the shade up from the window.

She watched for him and listened hour after hour, eagerly but not impatiently or critically. She lived for his coming, whenever it might be.

She was slight but straight and strong. Five foot two, she stood, a little mother of big men; for both her sons had been a full foot taller. "And here is the likes of me," she'd say, "outlivin' the both iv thim. And their faythers. But please, God, let me niver bury him."

Him—none like him, to her; not even her own sons, or her own man, whose memory never failed her. Him was her grandson, Cathal Martin O'Mara. And little as she was, and old as she was,—nearing two and seventy,—you could see resemblances between them. He had his good hands from her, and much of the strong, sensitive modeling of his head. His hair was like hers, fine and straight and abundant.

He had his blue eyes from her, even to the sparkle in them; and much, much more than can ever be told. And it was through her that he had the event which, of all elements that entered into his making, most affected him. She had seen it with her own eyes; and as soon as he had become old enough to understand, she had herself related it to him:

The tenth of July, it was, in eighteen ninety-three; and the lake shore along Jackson park was white with the great fine World's Fair buildings. And this day was fine, and the Fair was full crowded to the turnstiles.

She was seeing the Fair on that fine day, was Winnie O'Connor O'Mara, wife—and proud of him—of Cathal Martin O'Mara, of Engine Company Number Two.

Few had been the fires at the Fair, and none that did either hurt or damage. But this day was to pay up for it.

There were the white, tall towers reaching up to the blue skies, and none of them nearer to heaven than the tower of the Cold Storage building. And it was the bulk below that caught fire on this fine afternoon: it wasn't the tower at all, at the beginning. The alarms went out; and the fire companies came by, their fine strong horses running, and their big gongs beating.

"Play away, Two! Play away, One! Play away, Company Eight! Up with ye, Chemical Fourteen!" And up the men went to the roof, from roof and from ground playing their streams on the building. But the fire was full blazing and leaping; and it licked up the water that reached it; and more of the water fell short.

"To the tower!" shouts Fitzpatrick—him that was captain of Engine Company Two, and assistant chief of battalion. "To the tower with the water, and play on from above! Who's up to the tower with me?" And he set foot for the climb.

And twenty good men—the good of the best—the fair score of them wint up from the roof to the tower after him, dragging their hoses with them. And they got up and signed for water; and the engines give it to them, and there they played it down from the tower on the side of the roof that was blazing.

Sure it was a sight. From the Court of Honor, from the Manufactures exhibits, from the Art Galleries, from the Midway and all the shows between, the people came crowding to see. Thousands and tens of thousands of them. Faith, pushing at the firelines that day was a city of people.

For the fire kept on gaining. The water from the tower, like the water from the ground, was nothing to it. The blaze, it ran on top the roof; and that was not so bad, for that the men on the tower could see. But the flame, it ran along under the roof; and that they couldn't see till it broke up from below sudden on all sides at once, and cut off the tower entirely.

One man,—John Davis, of the Midway company,—he saw it the second before it burst up; and he hugged the hose-line and came down; and he reached the roof and ran over it before it all was blazing. But scarce was he down before the hose he rode was burned away; all other hose to the tower was burned away; and the life-line like them. Twenty men—the even score of them—stood at the top of the tower, the blaze all about below them.

One hundred and ninety-one feet from the ground, they stood; seventy above the roof blazing all about below them. And God alone could help them.

Winnie O'Connor O'Mara—she was thirty-five years old that month, and her sons were twelve and fifteen, but neither were there to witness the deed of this day—Winnie O'Mara, wife of a fireman, got through the throng to the fire-lines.

"Who's them on the tower, can ye tell me?"

"Fitzpatrick, assistant chief of battalion."

"That I know; can ye name some that stand up there with him?"

Cahill of Company Eight, I hear; Bill Denning of One; Lieutenant Freeman, One; Garvey; and Breen of Chemical Fourteen; O'Mara of Two; Nat Howard—"

"O'Mara, did ye say, of Engine Company Two?"

"O'Mara. Yis; I hear he went up—"

"He would!"

"Lord save ye, is he yours? Do ye know him?"

"Yes; I know him."

Then she saw him on the tower; she knew which, of the score of men beyond all human help, was he that was hers.

They crouched, for shelter from the heat of the flames below, on a bit of a balcony near the top. There, if the tower burned fast, they had ten minutes left them; at best, maybe twenty—bare minutes of life to those fine strong men that stood in the sight of all and must die. And they, best of all, knew it, as they looked down, the twenty of them.

And it struck all to silence.

Higher the blaze burnt, and hotter. Faith, you could feel it hot on the ground where you was thrust back by the fire-lines. What was it to them on the tower!

But no shame showed there; there was not a coward among them. All could see on the tower a man shaking hands with his fellow beside him. Farewell between men, it was; and another gave his hand to him.

Then the form of him hung in the air over the flames. For a flash of second, he seemed to stand in the air; for your heart had stopped for him. Then he came down. He'd taken his choice and jumped; and into the blaze he went, to the end of him.

Now a second shook his fellow's hands; and he jumped. Then they stopped that.

Some one on the tower had found a length of life-line. Like enough, they'd spliced some poor pieces together. They let it down but only to see it burn off. Yet twenty feet of line hung down from the shelf; it may have been twenty-five, but the end of it burning. One came down the rope to the end—the hands of him snuffing the fire where the hemp was burning.

He swung a bit on the rope, and those above tried to swing him out; so now you could see the dream of them. There was a spot on the roof below, which was not yet in flame, and the plan was to swing him at it.

He let go and dropped. And the rope, where his hands had been, caught fire again.

A fourth came down; and his fellows above swung to help him. He dropped, and there was the rope afire again, and each time shorter.

Who'd be next? On that tower there was no man that shamed himself, not one! "Ye go! I'll wait! . . . Ye go!" ye could see them saying.

Fitzpatrick, he had to order them; and all could see him do it, as they came down, one by one, each snuffing the flame from the rope as he hung and swung; and dropped—and then the line caught fire again.

Spirit of Kindness

KINDNESS is contagious. The spirit of harmony trickles down by a thousand secret channels into the inmost recesses of the household life. One truly affectionate soul in a family will exert a sweetening and harmonizing influence upon all its members . . . It is well-nigh impossible to be morose in face of a cheerful and generous helplessness. Beginning with the highest, the ointment drops even upon those who are unconscious or careless of it, and the whole house is presently filled with its fragrance. —Van Dyke.

Terms of Senators and Representatives

Representatives are elected for two years by the direct popular vote in November of even years. Each house is a new body, although many representatives are re-elected. Under the 20th Amendment to the Constitution congress meets each year, beginning January 3. Thus there is a new house in January of the odd-numbered years.

This procedure differs from the Senate, in which the terms are so arranged that one-third of the senators are new every two years, making it a continuous body in that the terms are for six years.—Washington Post.

A LETTER FROM DR. J. B. BOYER

(Written for last week)
Chapel Memorial Services Observed On 93rd Anniversary, June 28, 1936

The above mentioned day was a day of celebration in memory of the old faithful patriarchs of this old Church, who have gone on to their home in glory.

Unfortunately, I did not get to attend the morning services to hear our beloved Brother Tom Roberts and Brother Mitchell, who conducted the services, but knowing these two brothers, I know they did it prfectly, for the glory of God and the good of the people. And then, O my! How I did hate to miss that bounteous spread of all the good things to eat, the dear ladies had prepared for the comfort of the physical man. But the good women did not forget their old Doctor and friend, who mthey, well knew loved good things to eat, so they prepared a bountiful supply and sent up to me, enough for my supper and breakfast too, all of which I certainly enjoyed. The best thought to me was that they still loved me and thought of the old worn out Doctor, who had tried, for the past 48 years of his life to do all he could when called upon to relieve them in their suffering, physically, and for the glory of God. One of the sweetest thoughts to an old person is to know that he is not forgotten. God bless them all!

I got there just in time for opening the afternoon services, and although it was just at the time for Judge W. W. Wallace to make his talk, nothing it seemed would do, but for him and Brother Mitchell to push me up in front of that crowded house in order to make me show off my ignorance, which was short, and as the old woman said—"sweet if he had had sense enough to have knowed what to say, and then said it!"

I took my seat, and our beloved Judge Wallace, arose to begin his talk. As I looked over the crowd of hearers, I thought I could hear deep sighs of relief from every breast, as well as see from their eyes a glow of happiness, that they were going to hear something worth while from our distinguished Judge. Right here let me say, they had things right, for the Judge did not fail or disappoint them.

After the Judge's able discourse, we were entertanied by some of the best singers it has been my pleasure to listen to for a long time. And then came that old fashioned hand shaking—among old friends, ending the day happily for those fortunate enough to be there and unfortunate for those who could not be present.

U. S. Farm Tax Bill Smallest In 16 Years

AUBURN—The farm real estate tax bill in 1935 was $865,000,000 ,the smallest in sixteen years, reports the Bureau of Agricultural Economics to the Alabama Extension Service. The total compares with a peak of $567,000,000 in 1929, with $393,000,000 in 1919, and with $218,000,000 in 1913.

Farm taxes increased annually with few exceptions for nearly forty years—from 1890 through 1928, when th eaverage tax per acre was about six times that in 1890. This long time upward trend was broken during the depression. Last year the tax was about three and one half times that in 1890.

The Bureau recently completed tabulations on farm real estate taxes per acre for the years 1890 to 1930 for 198 representative counties in 23 states, based on information obtained from county tax records as part of a W. P. A project administered by the bureau.

In 1890 the tax per acre for the country as a whole average about 10 cents. By 1900 the tax was up to 12 cents an acre, by 1910 it was 18 cents by 1920 it was 50 cents and by1929 it was 59 cents—an all time peak. Taxes then fell sharply—breaking the long time up swing—and by 1934 averaged 37 cents an acre. Preliminary estimates indicate an average rate of about 37 cents in 1935 also.

"Sweetest li'l feller
Anybody knows
Don't know what to call him,
But he's mighty Lak a Rose."

Know anything more exciting or thrilling than the arrival of a "sweetest li'l feller?".Edna Lee, columnist, states on the subject: "The World may be rocking drunkenly from the effects of great happenings. Kings may die—empires be on the verge of war—floods devastating the country but all these pale into insignificance when a trim, white clad nurse comes from a white mysterious room and announces—IT'S A BOY"—So we join a host of friends in sending congratulations to Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Underwood (Elizabeth Carter) over the arrival of a BOY on Wednesday, July 15th—whom they have named Jesse Losson Underwood.

Thomas E. Knght, Lieutenant Governor of Alabama, was a distinguished guest in Columbiana on Friday.

One of the most delightful social courtesies we have heard about was staged in honor of Mrs. Mamie George on last Thursday night, when neighbors and friends surprised this charming addition to Columbiana's social circles, with a picnic dinner staged on the lawn of Mrs. E. M. Young. The night's program was in charge of Mrs. James Crawford and Mrs. E. M. Young, who alertly kept "something going" every minute in games and contests for the entertainment of the guests. Mrs. George has made legions of friends during the months she has spent with her daughter, Mrs. Frank Head in Columbiana, who will await her return from Fairhope, her former home, where she will spend the summer months, with happy anticipation.

We offer congratulations to the Board of Revenue for this improvement.

This column, like others to follow, written in Europe, traveling about by automobile, will represent an effort to see things clearly, and describe them simply, according to the old formula.

Arthur Brisbane

You descend from the ship at Havre into a world on wheels, bicycle wheels, a change from the world on automobile wheels left on the other side of the Atlantic.

Here working men and women, thousands of them, ride to and from work, ten to thirty abreast, depending on the width of the street.

They have the right of way, properly, in a democracy.

So it used to be in America, when automobiles were new, small boys shouted "Get a horse," and New York state law compelled the automobile driver to stop his car and engine, while a farm wagon passed, if the farmer raised his hand, or even lead the farm team past his machine if the farmer requested it. Here the car stops, while bicycles circulate around it on both sides. Similarly, you stop, later, meeting flocks of sheep, on roads across the salt marshes of the Vendee.

France is a land of bicycles, of many political parties, and, at the moment, a land of strikes. Like all other European countries, it is a land of permanent war scares. America looks upon war as a distant, improbable possibility, and when it comes spends billions on airships that do not fly, ships that never go to sea, and similar evidences of patriotic dollar-a-year efficiency. Europe's nations live in a state of fear, as an American family might live if it knew that, at any moment, well-equipped gangsters from next door might enter, "shoot up" the household and set fire to the house.

American travelers leaving the boat by railroad, descending in Paris at the Saint Lazare station, were surprised to find crowds fighting each other, not waiting for Germany, crowds made up entirely of Frenchmen of different political opinions.

Some wore ribbons with the red, white and blue colors of the French flag; others, more numerous, wore the plain color red. One side sang the "Marseillaise," national hymn of France since the revolution.

Others wearing small red flags sang the "Internationale," official song of the Communists the world over, from Moscow to Harlem. Crowds grew bigger, the Frenchmen sang the two hymns at each other, more and more violently, with excellent voices, not one out of tune, all knowing the words of their respective hymns. The "Marseillaise" says, "Let us go, children of the fatherland, the day of glory has arrived"; the other says, "Arise ye prisoners of starvation; arise, ye wretched of the earth."

It was a scene never to be described, now that Dooley is dead, and Artemus Ward. Nobody bothered the descending foreigners from across the water. A few Frenchmen hit other Frenchmen, not hard, then agents of the Surete, whom we should call policemen, gradually dispersed the crowds, that met and sang at each other again the next day. They live in the suburbs and work in Paris, or vice versa, and, meeting in the railroad station, it enrages them to encounter those that sing the wrong hymn and wear the wrong colors.

Those singers have chests like drums, complexions that reveal countless billions of red corpuscles and voices that could be heard, almost, from Los Angeles to Santa Monica.

One of them broke off at the sad word "starvation" and said to your narrator, who had politely congratulated him on his vigor: "Tenez, tatez mon bras, et j'ai soixante sept ans"—meaning, "Here, feel my muscle, and I am sixty-seven years old."

The muscle rose in a biceps like a small melon.

The duty of a visiting foreigner is to observe, describe and not comment; but this writer, had he accepted the invitation to speak at the American club in Paris recently, would have suggested that the French, whose only earthly possession is France, should be careful not to tear that property apart, especially with Germany ready to gather up the pieces.

This crosses the water by mail, is not new, and not news, when you see it. Only heaven knows what might happen in a week.

Auto Engineers Study Effects of Motor Vibrations

Humans Best Fitted to Stand Vertical Shocks

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. VA.—Transverse vibration, or sidesway, causes motor car riding annoyance quicker than any other type of vibration, it was disclosed here at the meeting of the Society of Automotive Engineers.

Prof. H. M. Jacklin, Purdue university authority, told of his studies of motor car vibrations with an instrument for measuring accelerations. The apparatus turns mere human guesses about riding comfort into facts and figures.

First using a shaking table in his laboratory and test subjects seated on hard type rattan street car seats, Professor Jacklin found the following comparison between the three possible types of vibration—transverse (sidesway), longitudinal and vertical:

Vertical	31.2
Longitudinal	4.02
Transverse	2.35

The figures represent an arbitrary scale devised by Professor Jacklin which gives a measure of vibration tolerated with only "disturbing" results. The important thing is that the human body will tolerate nearly twice as much longitudinal vibration as transverse, and nearly 15 times as much vertical vibration as transverse or sidesway.

Reactions to Discomfort.

Going from the laboratory to driving in real cars, Professor Jacklin used a specially chosen test group of observers whose records in the laboratory indicated that they were nearly normal in their reactions.

Particular attention was given to "disturbing" vibrations which Professor Jacklin defines as, "You note that certain organs or parts of your body have greater vibrations than you, yourself, and you try to prevent this by tightening certain muscles."

Molecules Sorted by Chemist Like Peas in Cannery

ST. LOUIS.—It is now possible for the chemist to sort out molecules, as a canning factory grades peas by passing them through sieves, by using cellulose membrane of the kind employed to wrap cigarettes.

How the "holes" in transparent cigarette wrapping material can be varied in size to allow such sorting was described by Prof. James W. McBain and Dr. R. F. Stuewer of Stanford university before the Thirteenth Colloid Symposium of the American Chemical society here.

Openings Are Adjusted.

"The holes," said the scientists, "may be adjusted smaller and smaller so that it is possible to put a solution of sugar or of salt or milk through and get only pure water."

Application of the molecule sorting, it was indicated, is in finding out how far certain molecules in a solution exist independent of one another.

"In a solution of pectin, which is the basis of most of the preparations which the housewife uses for making jellies, it is found that the colloidal particles of pectin contain one-third of their weight of molecules of water," the scientists reported.

One Chance in Million of Earth-Planet Crash

PROVIDENCE, R. I.—The chances were only about one in a million that the famous baby planet Anteros would strike an inhabited portion of the earth when it made an unprecedented close approach of 1,200,000 miles to the earth last February 7.

Astronomers and laymen can be assured by the calculations of Prof. C. H. Smiley and Ward Crowley of Brown university reported to the scientific journal, Science, which provide an antidote to the "sad stories of what might have happened if the planet had struck the earth."

Only sixteen of a million bodies coming to within a million miles will strike the earth, their figures show, and about 73 per cent will fall in oceans or seas and 23 per cent in sparsely inhabited territory.

Easy to Knit and Easy to Wear

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

IT IS a foregone conclusion among women of varied activities that knitted clothes are the logical sort to wear at play or at work. This conviction in regard to the practical wearability of things knitted has come about from actual experience, and not from mere theory. And so the clicking of needles goes merrily on, more so than ever this season.

There is added inspiration, too, in the knowledge that knit or crochet yarns have been brought to such high state of perfection through modern processing that one is cheered with the assurance of dependable washability both as to shrinkage and to color fastness. Thus a new confidence has been created in the minds of the practical minded to the extent that knitted apparel has come to be recognized as staple wear rather than in the category of fleeting moods or fads.

As to the knitted items pictured they are new and they are practical, just such as you will appreciate wearing during week-end and vacation hours. The suntan halter as shown in the upper left of the group will give you all the exposure and freedom you need in beach and summer sports clothes. You can combine it with knitted bathing trunks or gabardine shorts or the popular culotte costume, or wear it with a linen skirt.

Out in the garden on a warm summer day with gay flowers about and skies that are blue it will be the frivolous dainty type of a blouse you will be wanting to fit in with the joyous landscape. Centered in the picture is a pretty blouse that is so simple and easy to crochet you can make it in a jiffy. It is cool because it is lacy. Choose yellow for the color of the mercerized crochet cotton so that it will match the sunshine of a perfect summer day. This cunning model has practically no sleeves and is held together by a drawstring about the neckline in peasant fashion.

To the left below a sheer blouse is shown knitted of mercerized crochet cotton. It is the sort that will add the feminine touch to your mannishly tailored suit or will carry through smartly with your summer linen skirts. The rows and rows of tiny ruffles at each side above the waistline is something new. You will like this styling immensely and so will your friends for it is out of the ordinary. The sleeves puffed just above the elbow are also a smart and very new feature. The neck is high, giving that close-to-the-throat line which fashion decrees this season. This high neck effect fills the opening of a classic lapeled suit jacket to perfect satisfaction.

Cool and lovely in its dainty coloring is the dress pictured to the right. The majority of dresses are knitted but this one is crocheted of soft washable knit-cro-sheen. The work goes rapidly as the stitch is a very open lacy one. A dress of this type should go into every trunk that is vacation bound, for it packs, washes and wears beautifully. The soft rolled collar and the cord and tassel fastenings are style details that give "class" that is recognized at a glance.

Of course you have taken note of the crownless garden hats which the girls in the sweaters are wearing. You can make one yourself and at trifling cost—just one of those big farmer straw hats with the crown cut out and the brim slashed up the back, rounding the corners. Finish all edges with a wide bias-cut binding of gay gingham and add ties of the same.

STAR-PRINT CREPE

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Attractively studded with the symbol of the Lone Star state, this star print crepe cocktail dress is a special design in honor of the Centennial now being held there. The closely positioned buttons, the tunic silhouette, the fanciful slit hemline, the widened puffed shoulders and the turnover collar effect are all contributing style details. Free-flowing, allowing ease of movement, this smart-looking dress is ideal for semi-formal wear.

WOMEN ADD COLOR; DON GAY GALLUSES

Not satisfied with copying men's suits, both as to material and styling, the women are now wearing suspenders. They have discovered that galluses not only furnish an added chance to introduce color and swank to the accessory theme, but these dashing skirt "holder-uppers" are exceedingly practical. In the narrow width sizes, chosen to form a daring contrast with the suit and blouse, suspenders present a smart appearance as they flash out from behind an unbuttoned jacket.

The whole idea, designers claim, is not just another fashion whim but springs directly out of style requirements set by the present trends in women's apparel; mannish suits, hence suspenders! Clipping onto the skirt, suspenders hold this garment in line properly, preventing it from acquiring that ungainly "sat-in" look.

Swim Suits Are Dark and Snug-Fitting This Season

Wine-and-white is the prize color combination for swim suits this season.

Navy-and-white comes next, and then black, in lustrous suits of elastic satin.

Most of the newest suits have a dressmaker look. They are closely fitted, complete with uplift brassiere top, halter necks and sunbacks.

The great-open-spaces fad, which left the tummy bare to the sun's rays, is doing a graceful fadeout.

Negligee Ensemble

In making a silk nightgown, buy enough silk to include a little bed jacket to match it. This can be elbow or waist length and slip on over the nightgown for breakfasts in bed.

Lesson for July 26

CHRISTIANITY SPREAD BY PERSECUTION

LESSON TEXT—Acts 7:59-8:4; I Peter 4:12-19.

GOLDEN TEXT—Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.—Revelation 2:10.

PRIMARY TOPIC—A Man Who Was Not Afraid.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Stephen the Unafraid.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Persecution, Then and Now.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Modern Forms of Persecution.

Leaders of contemporary thought and observers of modern life decry the evident decadence of old-fashioned virtues. Our times are too materialistic, encouraging young people to strive for worldly success rather than high and noble character.

In a time when expediency is the ruling principle, it is well for Christians to emphasize the fact that following Christ has through all the years called for that loyalty to convictions which has caused some who bear his name to be willing to die for him, yea, even to live and to suffer for him, for sometimes it may be harder to do the latter than the former. True followers of our Lord are willing.

I. To Die for the Faith (7:54-8:1).

Stephen, one of the first seven chosen as deacons of the church, "a man full of faith and of the Holy Spirit" (6:5), having been called before the Sanhedrin to answer false charges (6:8-15), faithfully stands for the truth. His indictment of Israel cuts to the heart. In anger his hearers stone him to death. He becomes the first martyr of the Church, that holy succession which has representatives in the young manhood and womanhood of today, ready, like John and Betty Stam, to die rather than to deny Christ.

Note that in this hour Stephen was given a vision of his risen and ascended Lord (v. 55), standing at the right hand of God to welcome his faithful servant. He prayed for those who took his life (v. 60). How gloriously that prayer was answered in the subsequent life of the young man Saul, who was "consenting unto his death."

Not to all who follow Christ comes the need to face death for him, but all should be determined.

II. To Live for the Faith (8:2-4).

The early Church found that living for Christ entailed bitter persecution. Not even the sanctity of their homes was inviolate. Their persons and property felt the hard hand of havoc-making Saul, yet we find no intimation of complaint. Soon they were driven from home and scattered abroad, but the result was the establishing of gospel centers wherever they went. Living for Christ calls for daily witness, for more than steadily bearing the responsibility of life. Not to preachers and Bible teachers alone is this sacred duty given, to be discharged only in a church service or Bible school. No, "they that were scattered abroad"—all of them went "everywhere." They were not merely reforming or devoting their lives to social service, good as these might have been, but "preaching the word" (v. 4).

Are we who are now "scattered abroad" going "everywhere," and are we "preaching the word"?

III. To Suffer for the Faith (I Pet. 4:12-19).

1. We are not to be surprised by suffering (v. 12), not even by fiery trials, for blessings will follow. The Lord proves his children, even as the refiner tests gold to cleanse it, to prove its worth, and not to destroy it. God's testings are to prove us worthy.

2. We are so to live as not to suffer for our misdeeds (vv. 15, 16). Many are they who would have the world believe they suffer for Christ's sake when they are but meeting the just recompense for their evil deeds. It is a shame to suffer as an evildoer, but an honor and privilege to suffer for Jesus' sake.

3. Believers are to make their sufferings a testimony (vv. 17-19). If we as Christians must needs be purged in order to be fitted for God's service and the glory that is to come, what will be the end of those who "know not God and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Thess. 1:7, 8)? Peter refrains from even mentioning what their ultimate end will be, but the writer to the Thessalonians goes on to say that they shall be "punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power." Solemn words are these. Have we, and those to whom we minister, heeded their warning?

Real Character of Man

It is the relaxation of security; it is in the expansion of prosperity; it is in the hour of dilation of the heart, and of its softening into festivity and pleasure, that the real character of men is discerned.—Burke.

Our Friendships

How few are there born with souls capable of friendship. Then how much fewer must there be capable of love, for love includes friendship and much more besides!

Pinafore for Little Girl

The clever cutting of this useful pinafore is shown in the small diagram beside the little girl. You will see at once that this frock requires no seaming and of course the feature which so greatly intrigues children is the butterfly which forms the pocket.

Notice how simple it is to put on, merely slipped over the head and tied at each side. Mothers find it a great help because it can be used as an apron over a frock, which must be kept clean, or worn instead of a frock. The panties to match are an asset—they have the comfortable French yoke top and stay snug but never bind. This attractive design made in cotton, percale, gingham, calico, or lawn would be effective with contrasting binding and colorful embroidery on the butterfly pocket.

Barbara Bell Pattern No. 1910-B is available for sizes 2, 4, 6, and 8. Size 6 requires 1 1-2 yards of 35 inch material plus 7-8 yard for the panties. Send fifteen cents in coins.

We're getting warm now; we can almost understand it;

$1,027 AN HOUR
and THAT'S a lot of money in anybody's language especially when that much money is going out

EVERY HOUR!

To Alabamians for Alabama

THREE quarters of a million dollars a month — paid out in wages, spent with merchants, manufacturers and dealers, paid in taxes —is one of the Alabama Power Company's principal contributions to Alabama's business activity, her prosperity and her social advancement.

This sum averages $173,077 a week, $24,657 a day, $1,027 an hour, EVERY HOUR—24 hours a day, seven days a week, 52 weeks a year —pouring out into Alabama channels of trade, giving jobs to Alabama people, sending men and women and children into Alabama stores with money to spend, making more jobs possible, creating a bigger market in Alabama for Alabama products, increasing opportunities for Alabamians in Alabama.

This money builds highways, it educates children, it supports churches. It touches the life of every county in the state—not only the counties we do business in, but all the other counties as well. It benefits every Alabamian — including yourself!

The $9,000,000 being spent by the Company in 1936—in payrolls, purchases and taxes alone—includes $3,750,000 in salaries and wages to over 2,000 employees, and every one of them lives in Alabama. It includes $3,000,000 worth of materials and supplies bought from Alabama firms or from firms represented in Alabama and employing Alabama people. It includes over $2,250,000 in taxes paid to the state, the counties, the towns and the school districts of Alabama.

Your monthly electric bill buys for you electric service that ranks with the best and cheapest anywhere. But it does much more than that, for your payments, joined with those of 110,000 other Alabama homes, offices, stores and factories, are playing a big part in Alabama's prosperity and progress. That money, in the hands of a Company whose interests are all wrapped up with Alabama's interests, is much like the music in the song—"It goes in here . . . and comes out here!" Mighty little of it remains in the hands of the Company. Mighty little of it goes outside the state. Most of it is paid out as fast as it comes in—to Alabamians for Alabama!

MERIT TO RULE FUTURE CHOICE OF POSTMASTER

Civil Service Tests Will Strike Severe Blow At Patronage System

WASHINGTON—An executive order by President Roosevelt today extended to all postmasterships a merit system displacing one which made such appointments a matter of congressional patronage.

Affecting 13,370 postmasters of the first, second and third classes when theirfou r year terms expire, the order would provide a new system of Civil Service tests for candidates for these offices. The bottom grade of postmasters, fourth class, al ready are under the Civil Service.

Three methods for appointing post masters of the three top classes were provided in the order.

(1) Incumbents could be re-appointed after passing a non-competitive Civil Service examination to demonstrate their qualifications.

(2) Subordinate Civil Service em ployes of the Postoffice Department would be appointed to such offices upon passing a Civil Service examination, likewise non-competitive.

(3) Appointment could be made of the person making the highest grade in an open competitive examination, conducted by the Civil Service Commission.

At present that commission examines candidates for first, second and third as well as fourth class post masters but certifies to the postmaster general the top three.

Any one of those can be named and the prevailing practice has been to choose the one recommended to the postoffice head by the political patronage dispenser for the district, usually a representative or senator.

The Civil Service Commission said the order "was distinctly in the interests of the merit system."

"One feature," the commission said in a statement is that only one exam ination may be held for an office unless no eligibles resulting from the examination are found by the Civil Service Commission to be deficient either as to character or as to residence.

Farm Crops Farmers May Plant In July

AUBURN—Emergency feed crops which farmers in the drouth stricken areas of Alabama may still plant are listed by J. C. Lowery, extension agronomist, and members of the Ala bama Experiment Station staff, as follows:

1. COWPEAS:—Cowpeas may be planted in most sections of the state throughout July with reasonable expectations for fair yields if planted on good land. Plant 25 pounds or more seed per acre in rows wide enough to permit one or two cultivations. Sow broadcast on good rich moist bottoms at rate of not less than one bushel per acre.

2. SOYBEANS: — Soybeans the Otootan and Laredo varieties, may be planted the first part of July in upper half of state and later in lower half of state. Plant in rows wide enough to permit one or two light cultivations. Use 30 pounds of seed per acre. However, if seed are scarce, a lower rate of 15 to 20 pounds per acre of the small seed kinds may be used successfully.

3. SUDAN GRASS:— Broadcast 25 pounds of sudan grass per acre on moist fertile land. Sudan offers excellent ptssibilities on good land for farmers to produce sufficient hay for the farm. It produces a hay crop in a short time. It also is an excellent crop for temporary grazing.

4. SURGHUM:—Sorghum is an old "standby" for hay and for eutting green and feeding throughout Alabama. It is a crop that can be grown easily and should be used generally this season as an emergency crop. It may be broadcast alone at rate of 25 pounds or more per acre, or if seed are available broadcast with 1 bushel of cowpeas.

5. MILLET:—German millet is adapted for planting in July in practically every section of the state for cutting for hay. On good moist land it gives good yields in a short time. Broadcast millet at rate of 25 pounds of seed per acre.

There is a sales force of over 9,000 dealers serving farm and city communities in every state in the Union.

Did you ever stop to think that a big percentage of them could not be promoted to the next grade?

Do you realize this means the boys and girls must repeat the whole year?

This means a loss of tax money, because much of that spent was wasted!

WBRC BALL TEAM TO PLAY HERE TODAY

The fast base ball nine from WB RC, Birmingham's most popular radio station, will meet Columbiana's team Thursday afternoon at 3 P. M. Fans who witnessed this classic in the sports field last year will not be disappointed this season. Bill Young, WBRC Manager, states his team is in fine shape and despite the fact they suffered defeat last sea son, are determined to stage a come back this afternoon. The home boys are on their toes and ready to go. You will regret it if you do not take advantage of this base ball tilt which will take place promptly at 3 P. M. on the Sheby County High School Athletic Field.

Manager L. G. Fulton extends a cordial invitation to Columbiana and surrounding territory to be present this afternoon.

Fertilizer Sales Highest Since '30

Auburn—Fertilizer tag sales in 12 southern states during the fiscal year which ended June 30 totaled 4,163,301 equivalent tons, or 6 per cent larger than for the preceding 12 months, and was the largest volume for the period since 1930, announces the National Fertilizer sAsociation.

Which the exception of South Carolina, which reported a slight decline, increases occurred in all of the states.

Do you know in 1929 the teachers in both grade and high schools of seven counties averaged less than $60 per month?

Do you know that even with such salaries the state ran a deficit each year in keeping the school open seven months?

PLANT YOUR FALL POTATOES NOW

AUBURN—Now is the time for farmers who have not already done so to plant their fall Irish potato crop, advises Prof. L. M. Ware, head of the horticulture and forestry department of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute.

The potatoes do best where planted on a moist but well-drained productive bottom land. If this is not available they should be planted on the most moist soil found on the farm.

An application of 800 to 100 pounds per acre of a 4-10-7 fertilier si recommended. Contact of seed and fertilizer should be avoided as much as possible.

Small potatoes may be planted whole; large pieces should be cut to 1 or 1-2 ounce pieces. The seed should be planted 5-6 inches deep and 16 inches apart in 30 to 36 inch rows.

A 4 inch straw mulch over the potatoes will give a better stand and a much higher production.

The seed should not be treated in the southern half of the State with ethylene chlorhydrin. In the northern half of the State, where less than 6 weeks have passed between digging of the spring crop and planting of the fall crop, the ethylene chlorhydrin treatment may be of value.

Bliss Triumph from the local grown spring crop or from South Alabama or Rose Four from the Hastings section of Florida are the best varieties. Northern grown Green Mountain potatoes held in storage for the fall crop produce satisfactorily.

Do you know 205,000 rural boys and girls in Alabama were forced to stop school early last year?

Fitting Livestock Takes Real Skill

AUBURN—Fitting and showing livestock at County and State Fairs is a real art, according to F. W. Burns, extension livestock specialist, who says, "It takes patience and skill to train animals so they will show to best advantage in the ring.

"Feeding, too, takes real knowledge. The animals should be sleek and trim looking, but neither over-fat nor under-developed.

"No amount of work or feed will develop an inferior dairy animal into a blue ribbon winner. Only animals that conform rather closely to their breed standards should be selected."

When to start fitting animals is hard to answer definitely, says Mr. Burns. Much depends on the age and condition of the animal. On the average, satisfactory results may be had if two or three months are allowed for fitting.

"If the animals have been properly fed before the fitting period begins, it will not be difficult to get them into good condition. Certain fitting rations and feeding systems are used by various showmen, but none can be called the best for all purposes. In general, the simplest rations are the most popular, and for fitting they make liberal use of ground corn, ground or crushed oats wheat bran, and cottonseed meal in various proportions. A satisfactory mixture is 300 pounds corn meal, 100 pounds ground oats, 100 ponds wheat bran, 100 pounds cotton seed meal.

"With proper feed and care, get the animals in good enough flesh to present a smooth, sleek appearance. Then use a pair of clippers, a little soap and water, da o little manicuring, and the cattle will be all ready for the show ring this fall.

ALABAMIAN LOSES LIFE IN PLANE TO PROTECT CROWD

Naval Machinist and Pilot Pick Death Rather Than Endanger Others

Paul Gresky, of Montevallo, Ala., and his flying companion, Lieutenant William Oliver, of Maine, chose death recently rather than risk the lives of hundreds of spectators who saw their plane's wings crumple as it flew 500 feet in the air at Santa Maria, California.

The Alabama youth, a navy machinist and the 29 year old officer-pilot refused to leap from their plane when the wings gave way above the crowds. They cleared the top of a tent before attempting to jump in parachutes. Gresky leaped from the cockpit once the ship had passed the danger spot for the spectators, but his body was hurlted to the ground when his parachute failed to open.

Lieut. Oliver did not have time to leap after the plane careened over the tent. He was in the ship when it crashed to the ground, a safe distance from the horror-stricken spectators.

The plane, one of a squadron of nine flying from San Diego to San Francisco under command of Lieut.-Com. S. H. Warner, was in exhibition drill at the Santa Maria fair.

Gresky, who graduated from Montevallo High School in 1931, was servng his second enlistment in the navy. He married Miss Mildred Heath, of Montevallo, last summer.

Surviving are the widow, the parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Gresky, of Montevallo and a brother, Allen, of Montevallo.

Gas Tax Causes Decrease In Autos

Depression effects upon the use of motor cars and trucks were more severe in states with high gasoline tax states than in those which tax the commodity reasonably.

A recent study has considered both registration figures and gasoline con sumption. States were grouped into three classifications according to the severity of the tax on gasoline. The pre-depression peak year for both registrations and gasoline consumption was compared with the year in which those two indices of automotive activity reached their depression low-point before they again began to rise From the comparison the per cent of decline was computed, and as average obtained for each of the respective groups.

It was found that states which taxed gasoline at 5c or more per gallon experienced an average loss in registrations of 20 per cent. Another group of states, where the tax was 4c per gallon, had a decline of 13.8 per cent in registrations. States in which the gasoline tax was only 2c or 3 c lost only 8.9 per cent of registrations.

Results equally convincing as to the unsalutary effects of high gasoline taxes were obtained in an analysis of gasoline consumption . Losses of 11.1 per cent were shown in the 4c tax states, while the reasonable tax groups lost only 6. 2 per cent. Staes in the high tax group experienced a 13.7 per cent decline in gasoline consumption.

Further, it was found that the automotive depression in states with high gasoline tax rates, was generally speaking, of longer duration than in other states. In other words high gasoline tax rates not only accelerated the downward trend of both registrations and gasoline consumption, but were a factor in preventing a quick recovery .

Can Cull Chickens For Winter Months

AUBURN—Now is the most convenient and economical time for canning chicken because this is the usual time for culling the flock, advise home economics specialists. The plump two year old hens, no longer profitable to keep, are ideal for canning. Their meat has better flavor and texture after processing than the more tender delicate meat of very young chickens.

Farmers are especially urged to make fullest possible use of all moist, fertile creek and branch bottoms by planting them to feed crops.

Historical Sketches Of Shelby County

Before the name Columbiana was adopted, the burgh was designated by a number of names, more commonly called "Coonboro" as some say from a coon story: but I well remember the name was older at least than one of the stories (for I have heard a second). I give the real facts of one of them, as a matter of personal knowledge. Henry Brasher lived on the place the long-time home of Jefferson Elliott, on Four Mile Creek. There was a large pond at the foot of the hill east of the first house built upon the place by the original owner, Levi Weaver, then ccupied by Mr. Brasher. Mrs. Brasher had been washing, and leaving her little boy, two or three years old, at the house, descended the hill to rinse the clothes in the clear pond. Presently she heard the child screaming, ran up the hill and found a coon biting and scratching him in the face. With a mother's heriosm, she seized the coon by the throat and choked it to death, but her sleeves being rolled up to the elbow, the coon scratched her arms severely. I saw the child and mother a week or two after on a visit to my mother, and looked at the scratches on both mother and child then cicatrizing. The other story is that something similar occured at the spring in town, that part being then a wood. Of this I know nothing personally, but probably both occurences may have taken place, or the real one mislocated.

The first inhabitants of the place whom I best recollect, were first Dr. Carter Roberts who owned the place and adjoining farm now known as the Spencer place. He was a practicing physician, older brother of the famous Texan lawyer and statesman Oran M. Roberts. They were raised in St. Clair County. The doctor was a man of property, having married the only daughter of a Mr. Bridges, whose property, it used to be told, was made over to him on condition of caring for the old man in his old age and "furnishing all the whiskey he wanted." The first merchant I knew in the place, about 1823, was a Frenchman, whose name was Genet. His store stood about where the brick building known as Mrs. Sterrett's stands. was built of poles, perhaps a story and a half high, the family occupied the back part and upstairs. Mr. Isaac Estell was the Clerk and Supervisor. Messrs. Thomas and Samuel Brasher both in after years members of the legislature, who had a store a little while on the hill above the famous springs at the head of Bullace creek, next removed their business to the place. Merchants then embraced in stock dry goods, groceries, hardware and liquors. The Brasher brothers were men of reputation for high character and business capacity, and ultimately acquired a fine property. Their store at first stood where the residence of our worthy and genial druggist Joseph Parker now stands, indeed it may be a part of the old building. Soon after, Charles Mundine, who had occupied a year or two the same store at the head of Bullace creek also removed to Columbiana, occupying a log building, as the Brasher, which stood where Mr. Amos Elliott now lives He was regarded a sharp trader, and zealous and demonstrative as he was religiously, very frequently shouting, the boys used to tell hard tales on him and often made him the subject of sportive remarks. Mr. William Baker, the father of our venerable and beloved old citizen, Mr. James Baker, had a tavern where the burnt district now is, near the crossing of Main and College Streets, the first frame building erected in town. The second one was that still standing opposite the jail. About the same time "Davie" Owen opened his hotel on the Spencer lot, having purchased the fine farm adjacent. Mr. Baker's was a popular house, but I was better acquainted with Mr. Owen's. His table was prfousely provided with everything appetizing, largely supplied from his extensive farm. Mrs. Owen, however, was the ruling spirit of the establishment, a woman of great force and character, and reputed somewhat of a vigaro, once provoking one of her boarders to subject her to treatment such as a man rarly suffers. Coming out of the Owens house after dinner at the presidential election 1840, with Thos. P. Crawford, of Centreville, then a fellow-student at the University, smacking his lips he said, "You have mighty good eatins up here in Shelby."

We came near getting into a scrape that day. It got abroad we were going to speak. We were not ready for such a fearful proposition though very zealous young whigs. Then presently something quite amusng occurred. As we pased through the crowd an out-landish looking stranger, considerable in his cups, pointed to the buttons and stars on our University uniform and exclaimed, "I once wore that star ten years.' Meaning, I suppose, in the U. S. Navy.

About 1832, the brothers, A. A. Sterrett, Esq., and Dr. Malor Sterrett, appeared among us, just entering upon professional life. "Judge" Sterrett, as we afterwards knew him so well, was of most sedate appearance, grave almost to sadness in after years. He became a proverb of professional diligence and of fidelity in every relation of life; succeeded cleverly, married eligibly a daughter of Mr. Henry Gooch of the "Kingdom" and spent a long life with the exception of a few years at Kingston in Autauga County, legislator frequently, and for a time County and Probate Judge, with his chosen people. A model man socially and religiously, a strange depression and discouragement, due perhaps to softening of the brain, shadowed his last days. The doctor was quite a contrast in bearing-joyous, even hilarious old citizens even yet remember his ringing laugh. He was a successful physician, beloved by all, and greatly regretted when, after eight or ten years he passed away, short of the meridian of life. Pure, exemplarily pure in all his habits, he was eminently worthy of the esteem always accorded him.

John M. Clanahan, lawyer, legislator, probate judge, commencing his career a few years later, was a most interesting character. Teaching an old field school he went off to Tennessee, two or three years to a higher institution kept, as I have heard by a scholary uncle; returned a good scholar and himself taught a few years more grammar, mathematics, surveying, holding office as county surveyor; read law and soon came to the bar. At about twenty-six years of age he was elected to the legislaure by almost a unanimous vote. He gradually gained position at the bar and before many years accumulated a fine estate. H ewas a man of rare sagacity, full of sound advice, which he affectionately dispensed to those who sought it. His old pupils revered him, and when the news came back from Louisiana, whither he had gone to retrieve his fortune lost in the war, that he was slain by lightening(many a sigh escaped his friends of departed years.

Dr. Thomas P. Lawrence, a cotemporary for years was a remarkable man. Highl yeducated, well read up in his profession and in general science and literature, it was a treat to converse with him. His somewhat rough and stern manner, however, repelled some people. He seemed like a man that some unexplained and hidden grief preyed upon. Careless of his toilet, for the most part, when dressed up and in genial mood, he was a Chesterfield in manners. When he spoke inpublic, as he sometimes did, he was a Yancey, filled with glowing and noble sentiments, that penetrated the very soul of his hearers. Though not religious, he occasionally manifested the deepest emotion on religious subject. Leaving the community after some years for the West, it was rumored that he had returned to the ministry—which at the beginning of life he had exercised among the Methodists—among the Primitive Baptists. This imperfect picture of the times would lack shading if I should omi to mention "Dick" Shackleford, a man of finest personnel, of fluent and eloquent conversation, capable of anything he might attempt whose life prospects were blasted by drink. He used to explain with great pathos, when in his cups that having acquired his law education, he became engaged to a "most accomplshed girl," and the day of marriage was at hand, when unfortunately engaging in a social game of cards, not at all betting, the fact came to the knowledge of his prospective father-in-law, who at once interferred to break up the engagement. An explanation, he said would have at once repaired the mischief, but he was too proud to make it, and so lost his deep first love, hence all his woes; hence a reckless objectless life. His friends kept him up for years, but he gave way more and more to his unfortunate habits. At a late period he conceived a passion for another lady, when, wreck as he was, it was too late to expect encouragement. He lived, he died, he was buried; only in the last respect having a history much more enviable than the beasts that perish.

Governor Landon Accepts Republican Presidential Nomination—Organized Labor Schism Widens—Spain Torn by Bloody Civil War.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

GOV. ALF. M. LANDON now knows officially that he is the Republican nominee for President of the United States. Before more than 100,000 of his fellow citizens he stood at the south entrance of the Kansas capitol in Topeka and received the formal notification from Congressman Snell of New York, who was permanent chairman of the Cleveland convention. Around him were grouped a thousand leaders of the party, and in front of him were the throngs of his supporters and admirers who had gathered from far and near to do him honor and to witness the ceremonies. Trains, automobiles, buses and airplanes had been pouring them into Topeka for several days and the gaily decorated little city was crowded to the limit. Everyone was happy and enthusiastic and everyone appeared confident that Landon would be the next chief executive of the country.

Gov. Landon

The nominee's speech of acceptance was the plain spoken, outright kind of talk his hearers expected. Asking divine guidance to make him worthy of the faith and confidence shown in him, he said:

"This call, coming to one whose life has been that of the everyday American, is proof of the freedom of opportunity which belongs to the people under our government."

Here, briefly, is what Mr. Landon had to say on some of the more vital issues:

Recovery—"The record shows that these (New Deal) measures did not fit together into any definite program of recovery. Many of them worked at cross-purposes and defeated themselves. The nation has not made the durable progress, either in reform or recovery, that we had the right to expect . . . We must be freed from incessant governmental intimidation and hostility. We must be freed from excessive expenditures and crippling taxation. We must be freed from the effects of an arbitrary and uncertain monetary policy, and from private monopolistic control."

Relief—"Let me emphasize that while we propose to follow a policy of economy in government expenditures, those who need relief will get it. We will not take our economies out of the allotments to the unemployed. We will take them out of the hides of the political exploiters."

Agriculture—"We shall establish effective soil conservation and erosion control policies in connection with a national land use and flood prevention program—and keep it all out of politics. Our farmers are entitled to all of the home market they can supply without injustice to the consumer. We propose a policy that protects them in this right . . . We propose to pay cash benefits in order to cushion our farm families against the disastrous effects of price fluctuations and to protect their standard of living."

Labor—"The right of labor to organize means to me the right of employees to join any type of union they prefer, whether it covers their plant, their craft or their industry. It means that, in the absence of a union contract, an employee has an equal right to join a union or to refuse to join a union."

Constitution—"It is not my belief that the Constitution is above change. The people have the right, by the means they have prescribed, to change their form of government to fit their wishes . . . But change must come by and through the people and not by usurpation. . . . The Republican party, however, does not believe that the people wish to abandon the American form of government."

State Rights—"There has now appeared in high places a new and dangerous impulse. This is the impulse to take away and lodge in the Chief Executive, without the people's consent, the powers which they have kept in their state governments or which they have reserved in themselves. In its ultimate effect upon the welfare of the whole people, this is the most important question now before us. Shall we continue to delegate more and more power to the Chief Executive or do we desire to preserve the American form of government?"

FATHER COUGHLIN, the Detroit "radio priest" who in a speech before the recent Townsendite convention called President Roosevelt a "great betrayer and liar," has realized the impropriety of his language. He has published an open letter to the President offering his "sincere apology." The priest also says:

"As my President I still respect you. As a fellow citizen and as a man I still regard you highly, but as an executive, despite your excellency's fine intentions, I deem it best for the welfare of our common country that you be supplanted in office."

Dispatches from Rome said Father Coughlin's speech caused a "painful impression" at the Vatican, and Bishop Gallagher, the priest's ecclesiastical superior, leaving for a visit to the Vatican, intimated he might report on the incident.

IT SEEMS at this time that nothing can prevent the great schism in the ranks of American organized labor. John L. Lewis, head of the United Mine Workers, and his followers in the industrial union movement, are determined to go ahead with their plans for the organization of steel workers into a mass union, and now have expanded their program, proposing to unionize thus the employees of steel fabrication and processing plants.

Moreover, Lewis and his associates have declared they will not appear before the executive council of the American Federation of Labor to stand trial on charges of "fomenting insurrection," so it appears the council can do nothing but suspend the rebels and their unions, these constituting about one third of the federation's membership. If this is done, the final decision as to expulsion of these unions will be made by the national convention in Tampa in November.

The members of the Committee for Industrial Organization, the Lewis group, assert the contemplated proceedings of the council are unwarranted by the constitution of the federation.

Philip Murray, vice president of the United Mine Workes, gave out the news of the CIO drive to gather in the steel fabricators and processors, who number between 300,000 and 400,000 men. As there are about 446,000 employees in the steel mills, the goal of the CIO is now the organization of more than three quarters of a million steel workers.

SPANISH Fascists and royalists, in rebellion against the leftist government, were temporarily in control of most of the northern part of the country and were moving on Madrid from Burgos and Segovia, threatening to bomb the capital from the air if the government did not capitulate. In Barcelona, capital of Catalonia, fierce fighting was reported, and at the request of the Washington authorities a vessel of the American Export line was hastening there to evacuate Americans, whose lives were in danger. Catalonia had declared against the rebels.

C. G. Bowers

The rebels gained possession of San Sebastian, near the French border, and the loyalists were said to be making a desperate attempt to recover that town. This is the place where Claude G. Bowers, American ambassador, is in summer residence, and as communications were completely disrupted there was much anxiety in Washington as to Mr. Bowers' safety.

Socialists, Communists and workers in large numbers were joining the loyal troops for the defense of Madrid, and also helped in crushing the rebellion in several towns, according to the claims of the government.

In the south, where Gen. Francisco Franco commanded the revolutionaries, there was almost continuous fighting, and in the engagements between rebel planes and loyal warships some bombs and shells struck the Rock of Gibraltar and others fell close to a British destroyer. The latter fired warning shots and the acting governor of Gibraltar protested to General Franco.

THROUGH an executive order of President Roosevelt, all postmastership appointments in the future are to be subject to civil service examination. The order affects 13,730 postmasterships of the first, second and third classes as vacancies occur. Incumbents chosen for reappointment must pass a noncompetitive examination, as must employees promoted to postmaster. In other cases the examinations will be open and competitive. Fourth class postmasters already were under civil service.

COL. AND MRS. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH flew in a borrowed plane from London to Berlin, and were given a big reception by high Nazi officials, the press and the populace. The colonel was the guest of the air ministry at a luncheon attended by Germany's best aviators.

EXPLANATIONS and apologies are not enough for J. Edgar Hoover, head of the federal bureau of investigation, who was angered by the revelation that the doings of his "G men" had been under investigation by secret service men of the Treasury department. His strenuous protests started an inquiry that at this writing is still going on. Mr. Hoover also heard a rumor that some one was probing his "brokerage accounts," and this didn't help to calm him. Said he: "Anybody making such an inquiry is wasting his time. I have no brokerage accounts, so any effort to find them will be futile."

It is admitted by the Treasury that the secret service has no legal right to investigate the actions of any other government department.

SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE WALLACE, addressing the International Baby Chick association in Kansas City, discussed at length the drouth situation and the measures taken or contemplated for relief. He suggested this four-point program for the protection of both farmers and consumers:

1. Judicious commodity loans, especially in years of excessive supplies.
2. The ever normal granary.
3. Crop insurance.
4. Government purchase of land which definitely never should have been plowed.

SCATTERED rains over limited areas brought only temporary relief from the heat and drouth, and then warm weather started a new advance over the corn belt. The federal crop reporting board in Washington said the drouth was as severe as that of 1934 and worse than any previous drouths since the western country was settled. The serious conditions prevailed over practically the entire area from the Rocky mountains in Montana to the Hudson valley in New York and southward over western Pennsylvania, central Maryland, the Ohio valley, parts of Arkansas, and most of Oklahoma.

M. L. Cooke

It was announced in Washington that President Roosevelt had created a national committee to study measures for remedying conditions in the drouth region through utilization of natural resources. The committee is headed by Morris L. Cooke, rural electrification administrator. Other members are Col. Richard C. Moore of the army engineers; John C. Page, acting commissioner of the bureau of reclamation; Frederick H. Fowler of the national resources committee; Rexford G. Tugwell, resettlement administrator, and Harry L. Hopkins, works progress administrator.

IN OLYMPIA, Greece, scene of the first Olympic games, a torch was lighted by the rays of the sun and a Greek runner seized it and started it on a 12-day relay to the sports field in Berlin where the Olympic flame is to be lighted on August 1. Five thousand distinguished persons were selected to carry the torch, these including King Boris of Bulgaria, King Peter of Jugoslavia, and a long list of princes, statesmen and sportsmen. On the last leg it was to be borne by S. Loues of Greece, winner of the marathon in the games of 1896. A hundred thousand youths will accompany Loues in a parade to the stadium.

UNLESS the protests of Poland are effective, all opposition to Nazi power in the Free City of Danzig is due to be crushed. Dr. Arthur Karl Greiser, president of the Danzig senate, which is controlled by Nazis, has issued administrative decrees ordering:

1. Dissolution of any organization whose members, with knowledge of its executive board, spreads news "endangering the state interest."
2. Prohibition of review by the courts of police measures of a political nature, including those aimed at the right of assembly, the press, and free speech.
3. Prohibition of Jewish ritual slaughtering for food purposes.
4. Imposition of three month protective custody on persons declared to be "endangering the public peace."

Thus the city's constitution is virtually set aside, and the Poles especially, having extensive economic interests there, are indignant.

Chen Chi-tang, the Canton war lord, deserted his followers and fled to Hongkong on a gunboat. There was a scramble to find Chen's alleged silver hoard, said to amount to many million dollars, but much of it is believed to be deposited in foreign banks.

SEEN and HEARD around the NATIONAL CAPITAL

By Carter Field

FAMOUS WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington.—Return of the corner saloon figured in a conversation in Baltimore a few days ago which, retailed by some of those present, has been going all over Washington, exciting considerable interest.

The two leading figures in the conversation were a retired Irish contractor and a young Catholic priest.

The contractor was holding forth against Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. Just before he ran down he shouted that Roosevelt had kept just one, and only one, of the pledges of the platform of 1932 on which he was elected.

"What pledge was that?" inquired another participant.

"The promise to get rid of prohibition," said the contractor.

"Wait a minute," broke in the priest. "I don't think Roosevelt and the New Deal kept that pledge."

"We certainly got rid of prohibition, didn't we?" snorted the contractor. "We got liquor back, thank God. Hoover would never have done that for us."

"Yes," said the priest. "That part is true. But you are forgetting another part of that promise—a pledge without which, I very much doubt, you would have gotten liquor back. The platform and the candidate promised that, with the return of liquor, the saloon would never be permitted to come back. Well, the saloon is back. It is here. And I think a great many people resent the failure of that pledge more than the breaking of these others you have been talking about."

More and more talk is being heard all over the country about the liquor situation. The distilling industry is distinctly concerned about it. It has been pulling in its horns, so to speak, in many ways. The Distilled Spirits institute has persuaded many distillers to get off the air, and to tone down their advertising. They are more sensitive to what they fear is a change of sentiment than the brewers, and are worried that their advice in this direction has been ignored by the brewers.

Fear New Dry Tide

They are disturbed about local elections in various states, and are very much afraid that a new dry tide is rising. Meanwhile the drys are beginning to recover from the state of coma into which they lapsed about 1930. If they had had the vim and pep they have today in 1933, it is very doubtful if the eighteenth amendment could have been repealed.

Even the distillers do not fear another prohibition amendment in the federal Constitution. They do not believe there is much danger that 36 states would ever again ratify such an amendment. When the eighteenth amendment was ratified only two states, Rhode Island and Connecticut, refused to ratify it. Such wet states as Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey and Maryland, did.

But, most observers think, they never would again.

The danger is of another kind. It is of the spread of dry territory, county by county, state by state, with a resulting unfriendly political feeling towards the liquor business, and oppressive interference, such as preceded the adoption of the eighteenth amendment.

At the Federal Alcohol administration there is much bitterness against the big brewers for rushing into the old practices that were so sharply criticized. For instance, the "tied house" idea—where the brewer controls the individual saloon-keeper, and forces him to sell only that particular brewer's stock.

So there is a good deal more to the situation than any question of platform pledges.

Give Landon Edge

Tremendously potent in overcoming what remained after Cleveland of the "defeatist" attitude of Republicans all over the country, the first nationwide polls since the convention, in showing that Landon has a slight edge on electoral votes over Roosevlt, have been of extreme value to the Republican high command.

One of the reasons why John D. M. Hamilton has been making so many speeches, and making such optimistic claims — 42 states for Landon, etc. — has been to overcome this same defeatist spirit. He has recognized, as have most Republican leaders, that this was the first hurdle to be taken.

It is not just a question of bandwagon psychology. It was apathy based on hopelessness, which not only choked off contributions to the campaign fund, but prevented people who normally work for the Republican ticket from making any effort.

"Why work when it's no use," they were saying. "You can't beat a four billion-dollar-a-year spending machine."

Hamilton was working hard on this, but he was not being believed by thousands of the people who ought to be reached if the Republican ticket were to have a chance. Perhaps he went a little too strong in his claims to be believed. People were used to claims, even more extravagant made by James A. Farley, who claimed 48 states this year just as he claimed them four years ago.

But Farley has a better background for his claims. In the first place, he was wrong on only six states four years ago. Four of these six — Maine, Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts—elected Democratic slates two years later. So that a 48 state claim this year, from Farley, had a better chance of being accepted by Democratic workers than a 42 state claim by Hamilton had of being accepted by Republican workers.

Hope Aroused

Several Republican leaders, who motored back to Washington from Cleveland, made interesting reports of their wayside encounters—at gas stations, at small hotels, etc. Everywhere they found Republicans who wanted to know, once they realized their visitors had come from Cleveland, whether there was "any chance of beating Roosevelt."

"You ought to have seen their faces brighten up when I told them I thought we had better than an even chance," a delegate reported.

Organization Republicans have been wishing and praying for the Literary Digest poll to start. They have been bothering the life out of the representative here of a big farm weekly, which has been taking polls for years, and which have been rather accurate.

Not because they wanted the information the polls would bring. They have the situation fairly well sized up without that. What they want is the confidence and fighting spirit the publication of the news will have on the Republican workers all over the country.

There is another interesting angle. In the early days of the New Deal a great many Republican senators and members of the house of representatives went along with it to a considerable extent, voting for New Deal measures, etc. They were obliged—all the representatives and some of the senators—to seek reelection in 1934, and at that time they defended their own records, with no thought of any national campaign to come. They had to save their own skins first.

Honesty and Cheating

The idea that "cheating" the government is all right, though one must be scrupulously honest in one's personal relationships, is generally attributed in American schoolbooks to the Chinese. It has provoked amusement for generations. We Americans, we thought, were above all that.

Similarly with fiction stories about Russian officials, who could be bribed to do anything for a few kopecks.

The latter was pretty thoroughly exploded during prohibition. The chief difference between American officials and those of the czars seemed to be that the Americans were not pikers. Grafting prohibition enforcement officials retired rich, if they were not bumped off.

Some of them were honest, but then so were some of the Russian officials, though one seldom heard much about the honest ones in either country.

And now comes the payoff on the first—that Chinese are honest with each other, but will cheat the government, whereas Americans—

Most of us have known snatches of it here and there for several years. The writer knew, for example, of a county in South Carolina where the county agent representing the AAA encouraged a farmer to plant 300 acres in cotton though he was being paid for not cultivating those same acres by AAA.

One heard of lots of these scattered instances, but not until the White House begins building a defense against the charge that New Deal policies had forced a food shortage—might result in famine—would certainly result in food importations, did it come to light how widespread this "cheating" under AAA was.

Irritates Roosevelt

President Roosevelt was irritated by many printed stories of short crops, the probable need for imports, etc. So he "exploded" them.

He made the flat statement that the acreage planted in wheat in this country was ten per cent above normal.

Whereupon it was discovered on inquiry at the Department of Agriculture, that the payments to farmers for not planting wheat—under contracts made before the AAA was ruled unconstitutional—amounted to $40,000,000 on this crop!

Actually there is nothing really surprising about this situation at all, so far as farm payments, crop curtailment, etc., go. The biggest surprise is that the whole affair climaxed in a publicity boner.

SYNOPSIS

Jeb Braddon, young and fantastically successful broker of Chicago, is infatuated with Agnes Gleneith, beautiful daughter of a retired manufacturer. Rodney, a doctor, in love with Agnes, visits his brother, Jeb. Rod plans work at Rochester. Jeb suggests that he make a try for Agnes before leaving. In Rod there is a deeper, obstinate decency than in Jeb. Agnes believes to be happy, a girl must bind herself entirely to a man and have adorable babies. Rod visits Agnes and tells her of his great desire, but realizes it can never be fulfilled. Agnes' mother is attempting to regain her husband's love. Agnes has disturbing doubts as to what attracts her father in New York. Jeb tells Agnes he is going to marry her, and together they view an apartment in Chicago. Jeb asks Agnes to set an early date, but she tells him she cannot marry him. When the agent, Mr. Colver, offers to show them a furnished apartment, Jeb asks Agnes to see it alone, saying he must return to his office. Agnes consents and Jeb leaves. A radio is blaring terrifically from one of the apartments. Colver raps upon the door, which is opened by a scantily clad girl, who draws Agnes into the room. Colver finds her husband, Charles Lorrie, fatally shot. He calls the police. Myrtle Lorrie asks Agnes to phone Cathal O'Mara, a lawyer, to come at once. Agnes does. The police take charge. O'Mara arrives. The officers are antagonistic to him. Agnes sides with O'Mara. Agnes is to be a witness at the coming trial.

When a man swung far and fell feet forward so there seemed to be some chance for him, cheers screamed from the crowd; when he fell, tumbling over and over, a great groan went up from the throat of thirty thousand.

Winnie O'Mara did not faint. Her man was still on the tower, among the last of them. Now Fitzpatrick was speaking to him.

No bit of a doubt which was him when, before he went down the shred of the rope, he flung far the hat of him.

It was like him, that. There he was on the line, bareheaded.

A gray-haired priest stood in the swarm at the fire-lines, lifting his arms as each man came down, and repeating the prayer for them in extremis. Loud and clear in the stillness, as each man swung, and before the shout or the groan roared from the thousands of throats as the man let go, arose the voice of the priest at his praying.

Winnie O'Mara had worked her way close to him so that at last she was almost beside him; and so she did all that was left her to do for her man.

"Cathal Martin O'Mara, he is, Father," she whispered to the priest. "Pray for him!"

"Yours?" said the priest, agape at her.

"Mine, Father."

So the priest faced again to the fire; and once more he raised his arms in his petition. "Cathal Martin O'Mara," he called him by name, the tears streaming down his face as he prayed. Then the great cheer from the crowd cut him short, for Martin O'Mara had swung well, and well he let go. But no good it did him. A minute or so more, and the tower fell, and was down on top of him.

Such was the heritage of Cathal Martin O'Mara, his grandson. Of the twenty trapped on the tower, seventeen were gone and three were terribly injured.

"On such events, by such men, prepared to face death and torment—men, generation after generation, soon forgotten and obliterated—government was built up," wrote a historian of soldiers who perished long ago on a field for Rome. "The fact has a meaning; and perhaps, many generations hence, wiser men than we or they will explain it with a clearness that still eludes us."

Cathal's father and his father's brother John became firemen. Headstrong, heedless men, the both of them. Martin, the son, died of pneumonia after fighting a lumber-yard fire through one long below-zero night. John died of another cause; but the O'Maras had done their duty through the Fire Department.

Winnie, a fireman's widow and proud forever of him, would have no more of it. Besides, this boy was from birth "beyond" his father; and yes, beyond his grandfather. He was strong, as had been all the men of his family, but he was of slighter build and was smaller-boned. Heedless of himself he was, like them all; but his was a sensitiveness strange to them. And beyond them all, he took to schooling. He went through high school, running errands and delivering goods for local stores after hours, since his home depended then on a fireman's widow's award.

He worked his way through the University of Illinois at Urbana, and he ended his long schooling in Chicago at Northwestern University Law school, which he attended for three years, clerking at odd hours and in the evenings.

From all this, he emerged an attorney committed, by the undownable forces dominant in his nature, to the defense of criminal cases. It was the appeal of the desperate, the despised cause that was irresistible to the grandson of the Martin O'Mara who had followed James Fitzpatrick to the tower with the building ablaze below them. So he started taking criminal cases.

He cared little for money, but he adored a fight; and money enough came to him—enough, that is, for his purpose to buy a bit of ground with a bit of a house on it, and without a speck of mortgage.

Winnie's it was, in her own name and in her own right; for he gave it to her. "And that," as Winnie herself proudly complained, "is the wasteful way of him; sure, I'm nearest the end of me life; and well he knows the throuble of real-estate in an inheritance. Himself, he shud have kept it; or give it to his mother."

But she treasured it for her own, "beholden to no one but to him."

Ah! There he was, at last.

What thoughts were in him—Winnie wondered—when he came home like this? Him, home from the murders and the judges and courts and the jails—and the gentry in the headlines with him.

Winnie caught her shawl about her slight shoulders and hurried to the door, when he turned to it.

"Have ye supped, Cathal?" she questioned him, with eager anxiety.

"Where would I? At the jail? Have you kept nothing for me?" he retorted, delighting her.

She drew him, as soon as he threw off his overcoat, into the warm, fragrant kitchen where she had the heating-oven burning low, and on top of the stove, her old iron kettle simmering.

Nothing left to her in life compared with an occasion after he had been called into a big murder case, or when the trial was on and he had worked half the night, yet he had come home to her, at last, having "saved" his hunger so that she could sup with him.

She laid a loaf and the bread-knife and butter and bowls of the good hot soup upon the kitchen table; and they sat down and supped, across from each other, she watching him—seldom taking her eyes off him—he speaking to her, smiling at her, often looking at her, but with his thoughts far away.

And Beyond Them All, He Took to Schooling.

Winnie was used to this; and she did not resent it, though she wondered what went through his mind that he couldn't tell her. Here he was with her; and beside her a picture of him in the paper with his name huge in the headlines—as huge, almost, as the name of him that was murdered, and almost as big as the name of the girl, Agnes Gleneith, who had called him.

"The wife kilt him, Cathal?" Winnie asked presently.

He nodded.

Winnie could not comprehend the people, men and women, whom he defended. However roughly they lived, or heroically or rashly they died, her own—men and women—had sinned simply, repented, confessed and were shriven; and sinning or sinless, they were bound together by loyalties and sentiments which death only (and not always death) could dissolve. But from her, her grandson went out into the violent, faithless world of wealth, of extravagant excesses and bodily indulgences, divorce — and murder of man by his woman. How did a wife, calling herself one, do it?

Winnie flattened on the table the newspaper to display its picture of Agnes Gleneith.

He bent forward and suddenly he saw her as he had not known her.

It was a reproduction of a photograph of Agnes at the time of her debut three and a half years ago, when she was nineteen; and not even the newspaper press had obliterated the loveliness and delightfulness of her.

A glance told that it was when she was younger. It gave her to him, too, in her quiet, thoughtful mood, her eyes seeming to consider him, as they looked out from the page—her eyes which he had not seen without horror and without fright in them.

It surprised a pang in him which he betrayed.

"Oh," said Winnie, "that's how she called ye so quick. She knew ye."

"No," said Cathal, defending her from this imputation. "She's as the paper says—doesn't this say it? She just happened in, looking for an apartment."

"But she was quick to call ye."

"Because the wife asked her to. She—she never had need of me, Winnie."

"Wud that shame her," Winnie caught him up, "having need of ye?"

"I tell you she'd nothing to do with it; and she had never heard of me," he repeated so positively that Winnie abandoned the subject of Agnes Gleneith, but only to watch him more keenly.

He helped her clean up, as he always did. He bent and kissed her on her cheek; and he went to bed, but he could neither sleep nor lie quiet.

Frequently enough, when he had just taken a case, he lay half the night planning, yet with no disquiet such as this.

Agnes Gleneith had no need of him; he was a part of what was to continue, at best, an ordeal for her, which she would escape but could not. No; she had no need of him.

But he, and his client Myrtle, had need of her. More than that, they had the right to demand and enforce her attendance to their needs. By the accident of her stepping into that room, and by the fact that he was called to the case, Cathal Martin O'Mara had acquired peculiar and undeniable rights over Agnes Gleneith which he could exercise as he pleased.

And this was a circumstance of subtle and exciting effects.

CHAPTER IV

Jeb, on his part, was feeling the fillip of a new sensation which came from the not altogether disagreeable notoriety he suddenly shared with Agnes.

By this morning, when he was looking over the newspapers brought to his bedroom, all the world—as much of it as meant anything to him—knew that Agnes had discovered the Lorrie murder because she had been looking at an apartment with Jeb Braddon.

Strangely and excitingly, it intensified his feelings about her to read of her,—and a little about himself with her,—and to know that millions of people this morning were poring over the same descriptions of her, and the account of what she had done and said.

His eagerness to possess this girl in the paper—his love for her, his desire, whatever it was — never had matched this morning's.

He lived in an apartment by himself, with two Filipinos—Ojai his valet, and Imio the cook.

The measure of Judson E. Braddon's importance had been augmented, rather than otherwise, by what he had done with Agnes, and by the manner in which the newspapers referred to her and to him.

Jeb went late to his office, not yet having phoned Agnes. He hoped that she slept in order that, when she awoke, she would be the better rested and the more completely restored to the impulses which had made her respond to his. If not, he would give her more time to recover from this shock; but meanwhile, he knew she was his. And all the world knew it. His impulses for completer possession of her gave him no peace.

Agnes did not move from her room during the forenoon. She read in bed the papers which were brought to her, which gave surprisingly variant reports of what she had 'discovered" and done, and even more individual explanations of murder itself. And she saw, for the first time, the likeness of Myrtle's husband.

How queer to see your own name in great black type on the page of the paper, and underneath, reports of what you had said and done which you could not yourself remember, so precisely! How queer to find yourself a leading witness, but only now to learn, from a newspaper picture, what he, who had been killed, looked like.

The account of him said that he was forty-six a month ago. He had been married, first, 20 years ago, and been divorced to marry Myrtle Stiver two years ago. His wife and a daughter, and his father and mother, survived him in Stapleton, Wis.

He was described as "rich," having been a partner in a very prosperous group of chain-stores spreading through Illinois and Wisconsin. He had made his start in Stapleton, whence his father and his divorced wife and his daughter were coming to Chicago.

Agnes thought: "He was two years younger than Father, and had been married 18 years before he got a divorce."

There were large likenesses of Myrtle, who had come from Macon, Ind., to encounter, at a night-club in Chicago, Charles Lorrie of Stapleton, Wis., and marry him; and live as his wife for two years; and then kill him.

Below all this in the paper was Bert, her instincts told her. She ought to have spoken of Bert to the police and to the state's attorney. . . . Or, should she have?

Jeb was on the phone—Jeb, whom (as all the world had reason to suppose) she soon would marry.

Jeb's voice was happier this morning; Jeb exulted that everyone who read the papers believed that he and she were to be married. And Agnes realized, as she replied to him, that she had given him much of the right to feel as he did. You could not revoke a thing like looking at an apartment with a man, especially after all the world caught you at it.

Paris: Of Many Newspapers
Surprise for Karl Marx
Mr. Eden Was Tired Out
A Big Somersault

This world is really no bigger, now, than the palm of your hand; wherever you are, news comes pouring in — a Pullman car on the Mohave desert has the "Examiner"; flying across, the Levand brothers hurry to the airfield at Wichita with the latest "Beacon"; and on the ocean, a newspaper appears every day; the radio feeds it; in Paris, ten times as many newspapers as are published in New York tell you anything you choose to believe, from editorials written by men who do not know that the royal and imperial French families died and were buried after the war of 1870 to fiery-eyed moderns who think they can graft Karl Marx and Lenin on Jacques Bonhomme, the French peasant, and produce a Russian accent and a pair of high boots.

Arthur Brisbane

They do not know Jacques Bonhomme, who bought his land in the revolution at bargain prices with inflated assignats, and means to keep it, nor do they know the small-sized French bourgeois, who thinks more of one four-cent franc than some of our governing geniuses think of a billion 59-cent dollars.

The Marx-Stalin-Lenin brotherhood in America, by the way, does not understand the inside feelings of the U. S. A. citizen, with his bungalow, automobile, radio set, washing machine and furniture, all "nearly paid for."

Send HIM, instead of a bill for his last installment, the statement, "No more private property," and see what he says and does.

You take your choice of dozens of Paris daily newspapers; the wild kind, that say anything and lose money; the tame kind, that say nothing and make money, but very little of it; the mummified kind, that still take "Madame La Marquise" seriously, and think themselves back in the days of old Madame De Deffand and Lord Bolingbroke.

You have, also, newspapers from all the Lilliput countries nearby—English, Italian, German—and the news is in them, only you must know how to extract it. They are queer little newspapers, and if that be provincialism, make the most of it.

In London, for instance, Lord Rothermere's newspaper tells you that Mr. Eden, British foreign secretary, has gone to "a secret destination" in the country for a week's rest.

English statesmen always go to "a secret destination," for reasons unknown to Mr. James Farley, who relaxes at the ringside, or President Roosevelt, who rests fishing, on a battleship, with fifty reporters on another ship, nearby.

You wonder that a man as young as Eden should need a rest. Gladstone, at nearly twice his age, was talking in the Commons at four in the morning—but Gladstones are few, Tim Healys also.

Rothermere's writer thinks Eden is all tired out after his Geneva speech, telling just why England lifted the Italian sanctions. It was he who made a speech recently, just as earnest and much louder, telling why those sanctions must NEVER be lifted. That was turning a big somersault. The English know how to do that, and you are supposed not to laugh.

Eden told Baldwin what the doctor said, and Baldwin said, "By all means, my boy, hurry off to a secret destination," and Eden hurried. In America, the businessman would say, "Doctor, there are a few things that I must settle first," meaning, perhaps, his income tax. He would hang on and on, and finally go to a really secret destination, in the graveyard.

Driving through Normandy, from Havre, where the ships land, would interest American farmers, especially any whose lands are "worn out" after comparatively few years of cultivation. On lands in this part of the world, wheat has been grown for three hundred years, and today yields better, bigger crops than ever.

In Rome, as in other places on the earth's surface, one city is piled upon another. Dig down through one and the other appears. Invasions, plagues, famines and the grinding ice have wiped them out.

Those that read this today are the descendants of men such as the inhabitants of the Stone age village. And still we are worried, looking down at the enemy, poverty, that may climb up and attack us in old age.

Always sweep rugs and carpets the way of the grain. Brushing against the grain roughens the surface and it tends to brush the dust in instead of out.

Sugar sprinkled over the tops of cookies or sponge cakes before putting them into the oven forms a sweet crust and makes a richer cookie.

Dogs on Alcatraz Isle

Alcatraz prison, the Devil's Island of America, a prison on a rocky island in the middle of San Francisco bay, fortified with all the latest scientific gadgets, and manned by the most experienced crew of prison workers, has found it expedient to reinforce its crew with trained police dogs.

Sanford Bates, director of the Federal Prison bureau, declared that "Dogs are better prison guards than men. Their powers of sight, smell and hearing are far keener. They are trained to knock down the man they are sent after, but not to hurt him."

Several repiles have come in during the past few weeks, asking about the County Wide Scout Rally that this column mentioned some time ago I might say at this time, we will not be able to hold the rally for some time due to the sudden spread of Infantile Paralysis.

We did not mention the rally because we did not care to turn on the heat too strong and raise our hopes enough to cause disappointment. However, we wil lagain begin to make plans as soon as the opportunity presents itself At the present time we must show the Health Department that they can count on the Scouts to do their part in preventing any further spread of this dreadful disease.

We notice in this weeks Wilton Troop Notes, that the Wilton Scouts have already stopped their meetings. I feel sure that the Health Department can count on the other Scouts of the County to do likewise.

As soon as the proper Health Authorities see fit, we will go ahead with plans for the rally.

Siluria will soon have a brand new Troop of Boy Scouts, according to Bob Orr, who is heading a movement for a one hundred per cent group of boys who will be known as The Boy Scouts of America.

You remember, some time ago, Siluria had a Troop of Scouts. But that was when J. W. Letson, Jr., was Scoutmaster. Since Mr. Letson has been called away, it just seemed that we couldn't find anyone who would try to fill Mr. Letsons shoes, or at least they were afraid to try to lead a group of boys. Why, we just wouldn't say.

MR. Orr, who is connected with Buck Creek Cotton Mills, has succeeded in showing B. C. C. M. the necessity of a program to keep the boys, who are too young to work and have too much spare time, busy. As soon as Mr. Orr managed to convince them of the necessity of a program of this type he announced that Buck Creek would sponsor a Troop.

If all plans work out, Siluria Scouts will be admitted to Buck Creek's private camp (Camp Okomo) at least once a month, both in the summer and winter.

The Camp has eight cabins, a keepers cabin, a bunk house and mess hall together, a boat house and a number of boats and is located n a splendid place for hiking and swimming. The camp can be reached by train. The station being just at the edge of camp, will allow boys who are not able to go at the time the truck leaves to come by train at a later date.

Wilton Troop Notes

(Written for last week)

Tuesday morning, the Wilton Boy Scouts went to the Troops cabin for an overnight Advancement Camp. Quite a few tests were passed, the exact number passed was twenty-three. J. W. Ward and Winston Hogan worked on Track and Swimming Merit Badges.

At our regular meetings Friday night, a mock trial was held, Fred Adams, the defendant, was found guilty of robbery and sentenced to three hits by the Judge. After the trial, plans were made for the first issue of the Scout paper which will be published soon.

The Wilton Scouts would like to hear more about the Rally.

Robert Adams, Troop Reporter.

SILURIA NEWS

By Nell Walton

Finding news in our little town is not the easy job we heard it was. But anyway we just can't let our good pal, Bill Thomason, down, and we promised to write what we could. So here goes our first adventure in the "Journalistic World." Everybody seems to be going somewhere but nowhere in particular. Just hunting somewhere to go, and somethng to do. A crowd hunting a cool spot to relax in, packed up and whisked off to Camp Okomo this past week end. Some included in this group were; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Johnson, the Popes, Bill Thomason, Allen Jackson, Bob Orr, Mr. and Mrs Hubert Denham and children. Quite a bit of excitement was had when an inner tube on which Rubye Denham was having a big time floating took a sudden notion to burst. Rubye, being unable to swim, went under the second time before she was rescued by her Dad, who happened to be sitting on the bank at the time the tube bursted. The little brunette beauty says the song like to have gone like this, "Rubye Doesn't Live Here Anymore." We also hear that Bob Orr has a weakness for sleeping on floors. Bob I've been told that Bill and Jack kicked you right out of bed on the floor and you didn't know the difference until the next morning——Smith says that isn't the first time he found you sleeping on the floor. Next time tie Bill and Jack in the stable with the rest of the horses. Walking down the street I happened to meet one of the towns most handsome gentlemen—and gosh what a smile that boy had on his face—from all reports he has just returned from Talladega where he went to visit a very sweet little blonde—Yes, it was George Thomason—and from that amusing smile he must be hiding a deep dark secret—come on George, what is it?—or must we wait a while to know? Seen in Siluria over the week end and having a swell time was Codger Boyer. Our little town is glad to welcome Codger home—we haven't learned just how long he is going to be with us, but we hope it is a nice long visit. Mr. J. T. Phillips, who is better known in Siluria as the Cap'n was home from New York last week end. He only stayed for a while, coming down to see Mrs. Phillips and son Fred. We did not get to see the Cap'n personally, but from all reports he was looking swell. The whole town is looking forward to the time Mr. Phillips will be home for good. He is greatly missed by every one. This kind of weather makes everyone want to pack up their troubles and ride, ride, and ride—and that's just what Joe P. Waggoner and Reese Hatfield did—motoring to Montgomery Sunday to spend the day. They report a swell time. Margaret Tilley is all thrills over her week end trip. She spent the week end in Birmingham with Miss Ester Jackson. One of the nicest things that ever happened to Yours Truly was a surprise Birthday party on last Monday night. Walking off for a little stroll before night and returning found all the gang gathered to wish her a happy birthday. There were many beautiful gifts, and every thing that goes with a swell party. It's a nice feeling to know you have so many nice friends. Well, that's about all the dope I know for this week. Your's 'till Niagara falls.

CLEAR TRACK AHEAD!

Actual L & N scene along Licking River in Kentucky

With "Go" signals showing all along the line, the American railroads are driving ahead to new triumphs in service and efficiency—going after business, and getting it, in a way to make any railroad man justly proud.

Of course the recent years have not been easy. But in face of tough times, these dependable carriers have made their bid for increased business by stepping up freight train speed by 43%, by cutting the running time of passenger trains, and by increasing their comfort by air conditioning, providing greater cleanliness, restful quiet, safe, agreeable travel at its best.

At the same time there has steadily gone forward a vast program of improvement—$172,000,000 invested in the past six years in laying heavier rails—a third of a billion dollars spent during the same period in new track construction, and more than three billions put into right-of-way maintenance—all of which makes faster schedules possible with safety.

And the L & N has shared in these giant forward strides. Never before could this railway give you such superb service—take you on your journey with such speed, economy, comfort and safety.

L&N
THE FRIENDLY RAILROAD

What the L & N Means to the Central South

Employs 26,000 people, breadwinners to many thousands more.

Payrolls amount to over $40,000,000 per year. Buys over $10,000,000 in supplies per year. Pays over $4,000,000 in taxes annually. As a citizen, therefore, it contributes to the welfare and commercial interests of the communities it serves and those outside from which it purchases materials and supplies.

It offers courteous, complete, fast and dependable freight and passenger servvice. It asks the patronage of the public in the hope that it deserves it.

PENPOINT PARAGRAPHS

MRS. E. B. COOPER HONOREE AT LOVELY AFTERNOON TEA

The social season in Columbiana reached its peak on last Thursday afternoon when one of the loveliest courtesies of the summer was extended a recent bride, Mrs. E. B. Cooper. The beautiful home of Mrs. Homer J. HENRY NAISH

We personally like people, and "officials," who do not forget to remember to hand our "posies" to us while we are here to enjoy and appreciate them. So we pause amid the busy hum of a busy office on Monday morning, to express our appreciation to Henry Naish, Treasurer for his always courteous service as an official in the Courthouse—and as a consistently thoughtful friend who brings us flowers from his own lovely garden in Siluria. The desk looks gaily colorful with the beautiful Dahlias we are enjoying today. Thanks a million "Hennery"! We promise faithfully never to mention the CHECKER GAME again. Next time we will tell about the DOMINO party we interrupted!

G. C. GLASS

G. C. Glass, former manager of the Yellow Front Store in Columbiana, has accepted a more lucrative position with the Hill Grocery Co., in Montgomery. Mr. and Mrs. Glass have many friends in Columbiana who regret to learn that the new position will necessitate their removal to Montgomery. JATIE L. LONGSHORE

Friends throughout Shelby County of the talented and versatile Jatie L. Longshore, will be delighted to learn she has accepted a lucrative position with the E. E. Forbes Piano Company in Birmingham. The Forbes Company is one of the oldest an dmost popular Music Houses in the South—and we offer congratulations to the owners, for their wise judgement in obtaining Mrs. Longshore as a valuable addition to their staff of efficient workers. Mrs. Longshore, for a number of years taught Violin and Piano in Shelby County High School, and more recently directed musical activities in Clanton, in connection with her radio programs and Pipe Organ position with one of the largest churches in Birmingham. While a visitor in the Democrat office on Monday, she cordially invited all her friends in this territory to call by the Forbes Piano Company and see her when in Birmingham.

DELILAH CURRY

Delilah Curry, popular Beautician, came "smiling by" another little mile stone on her calendar of days on last Monday. The many gifts, personal calls, and good wishes showered upon this gracious and charming addition to Columbiana's social and business circles attested her popularity. Miss Curry formerly resided in Montevallo, but Columbiana now happily claims her citizenship as a coveted possession. In other words, we have "adopted" her for "keeps."

Gay, colorful fabrics are shown in the new woolen sports suits—and high waistlines—almost empire styles with very short skirts will be the latest vogue when you go a shopping!

Cullen Morgan, Editor and Publisher of the Hale County News was a visitor in the Democrat office on Tuesday. We personally enjoyed the chat with this co-worker in the art of journalism. Fellow craftsmen have a lot to talk about—"ships that slip by on a sea of printers ink—and swapping experiences in editing a weekly was a happy diversion.

Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Horton of Vincent spent Tuesday in Columbiana. Mr. Horton will again head the Vincent Consolidated School, making his fourth year in this locality.

Charles Benton, who holds a responsible position with the Liberty National Life Insurance Co., in Birmngham, is spending his vacation with his mother, Mrs. Fay Miles Benton.

Judge and Mrs. L. B. Riddle have returned from a vacation spent in Gadsden and Talladega.

TRUTH IS STRANGER THAN FICTION

I have seen, in my rambles around the Dome, many strange things happen which would be creditable cartoons for Ripley's Believe It Or Not. Some Tragic—Some Romantic—Some Comic—Some Dramaaic! Corners and crevices might yield many a good story—but, when we sauntered into the Circuit Clerk's office on Wednesday afternoon, and saw the jolly, good old Circuit Clerk "Calvin" thoroughly tame and domestically unconcerned, SHELLING BUTTER-BEANS, aided and abetted by son, Jesse—with the expressed hope that no remonstrance against cooking them would be offered when they reached home. Well, we gave up and called it a day! (Gladys—if your good and affable disposition does not wilt with this culinary assignment this hectic weather—well, you are a better chef than I.)

Heart Drifts

WHY WALLS?

Permit no walls to hold your soul,
Which would ascend to heights sublime;
Why cramp, why hinder, blast the bud
That well could flower any time?

Why choke the course of thought that night
Run rich, unhindered, full and free—
A river flowing on its way
That gives of fruit to grain and tree?

Why yield your mind to petty rules,
To critic's ready, scornful tongue
To jealousy and prejudice
To which we all so long have clung?

Lo, through your asking, by your prayer
The truth of Truth will soon break through
The walls and inhibitions high
And find the very thing that's you!

Your soul will rise in freedom new
Will soar above instead of plod,
And, master of itself, will live
And sense at last the pulse of God.
—Katherine Hayes

TAKE ALL OF ME

Take all of me . . as music draws the strain
From mellowed wood and strings that sob in pain;
So strike my heart 'till I give back in faith
Song to make an agel pause at Heaven's gate
Fearing to lose such wond'rous melody.
Take all of me . . . I am the song of thee.

Take all of me . . . as red dawn draws the flower
With hungry mouth to kiss one raptured hour;
So press your lips to mine and in that breath
Let me taste love and live and birth and death
'Till I'm consumed with burning ecstacy!
Take all of me . . . FOR I WAS MADE FOR THEE!
—Gordon Johnstone

SOMEONE WORTH WHILE

I have left behind them ,the things of youth,
The things that were worth while.
A little faith, a little truth.
And a litle boy with a smile;
And the world doesn't seem the same old world,
And it isn't I guess, for I must confess
There's something gone that will never come back,
Something worth while.

I have left them behind, the old friends, too,
The friends that were worth while;
A little love, a heart so true,
And a little girl with a smile;
And the world doesn't seem the same old world,
And it isn't I know, for my heart's aching so;
There's someone gone but I wish she'd come back,
Someone worth while.
—Gordon Johnstone

MOUNTAIN TOP

I think that some day I shall climb
To the top of a tall, tall hill
And let the breeze blow in my face
The sun its warmth instill.

Up there where the blue sky bends down
To meet the emerald sod,
I'll be content to sit and dream
And make my peace with God.
—Crain.

CAVATINA

Too dear a thing this, too dear
For any sum of syllables to designate
Therefore I do invoke a rich uncertain silence
To pronounce the symbol that will sing
Across the desolation of my heart
The fragrant iridescence that was YOU.
—Contributed.

PARTING

They tell me if I dropped your hand
Walked on another road ,
It would not be a cobbled way
I would not have a load.

I'd have a dress made of real silk,
Trimmed in a bit of lace;
I'd have my hair done all in curls,
And powder on my face.

My hands would soon grow soft and white
My nails with pink would glow—
But that I'd be quite dead inside,
They do not seem to know.

PERFECTIONISM

In the humility born of a true experience of Jesus Christ is none of the cocksureness so characteristic of a certain type of American, that naive assumption of 'having arrived' at perfection. Jesus' purity alone drives home the truth about human nature in a way that leaves him who sees the vision and recognizes the disparity between that revelation and himself with a recurring sense of worthiness. "Lord, have mercy upon me" is a petition that arises naturally from the heart of the twice born.

Skeptical and superficial critics, sensing an inner assurance and security in surrendered people, do of course, often read into the picture what is not there. For example, it is sometimes said that witnessing Christians think that they are better than others. Because they profess to believe in the absolute standards of the New Testament they are stigmatized as perfectionists. In reality, those who seriously accept such words as "Be ye perfect, as your father in heaven is perfect," may be the last people in the world to look with satisfaction on their own lives. They may be the first to condemn "perfectionism" and to classify them selves as sinners, their fellowship a fellowship of sinners.

But let it be especially noted that such an attitude does not empty these words of Jesus of all meaning. Disciples, in the true sense, soon reveal certain definite facts about the perfection which Jesus is recommending, which are neither vacuous nor important.

First of all, a surrender to the Lord Jesus Christ brings a perfection of "direction." Like the discovery of a mountain-trail, the acceptance of absolute honesty, purity, unselfishness and love shows which way a man should go and shows it with precision. A mountain climber is not usually interested in by-paths; only the trail that leads to the peak commands his attention. For him that is the perfect trail, for it alone, takes him where he wants to go.

Conceivably, here may be another path close by it may be just as clear a trail and just as beautiful, but it misses the summit by just a little bit, it will not bear comparison. So, with a ship, there is only one perfect direction; however fast the speed, however constant the progress, a variation of even a point on the compass changes everything.

There is a Christian philosopher who is fond of saying, "If I did as well for a man as Ronald (a collie) does for a dog, I would be satisfied." The perfection of Christ's followers includes also what someone has term ed a perfection of effort. To return to the mountain, it is comparatively unimportant where one discovers the trail, in the shady forrest at the foot or farther up on the rugged mountain-side. But once on the path, it makes considerable difference whether one spends the next few hours in, let us say, gathering berries or in climbing. If there is a time for relaxation, there is also a time for stiff concentrated exercise. Jesus expects the climber to use whatever strength and skill and perseverance he has and climb. Given your size, your experience, your condition, what is your best! That is the question.

Finally, there is a more subtle way in which a Christian should experience perfection. This has to do with the experience of forgiveness, the change in the inner man. The new life is marked by a mysterious freedom, which is definitely God given, and relates somehow directly to the person of Jesus Christ and to the cross and to all that he wrought there. It is not a sense of "getting off Scot-free" from past mistakes; nor is it promised escape from future difficulty, although with conversion there does come a certain bouyancy which lightens every load. It is rather a feeling of being made clean, of being allowed a new deal, a dispensation from on high, quite undeserved and unearned. Gratefully one looks ahead, up the trail. Burdens seem lighter. And one is conscious even as he sees the ascent and comprehends its steepness, that he is newly fit and newly ready to undertake the climb.

Cosmic Radiation Helps Stars Send Light to the Earth

Tiny Particles Produce Changes in Stellar Bodies

WASHINGTON.—Cosmic rays and other sorts of fast-flying atomic particles which are shooting continually about the universe between the stars, planets and galaxies may explain many of the mysteries of astronomy, it is suggested in a scientific report published by the National Academy of Sciences here.

Dr. Fritz Zwicky, California Institute of Technology physicist, points out in the proceedings of the academy that cosmic rays may be responsible for some of the light received from giant stars and that the rays also produce forces sufficiently great to cause—in the course of time—astronomical changes. So far, Doctor Zwicky intimates, only the terrestrial aspects of cosmic rays have been studied by scientists.

Cosmic Rays Busy

Cosmic rays, the California scientist states, may be expected to be scattering continually the clouds of gas molecules which are thought to be the first step in the formation of a new galaxy of stars. Gravity is the force which tends to build up these clouds of molecules.

Thus, contends Doctor Zwicky, astronomers may some day need to consider cosmic rays as an additional force acting when they construct their astronomical hypotheses.

No corner of interstellar space escapes these tiny bullets. Wherever they hit matter they break up atoms, and wherever atoms are dismembered light is emitted when the pieces come together again.

Source Is Unknown

The faint glow of the sky on clear moonless nights is partly due to this unceasing rain of high speed particles. Likewise, says the California scientist, the luminosity of comet tails, certain interstellar gas clouds, and outer atmospheres of giant stars, may be due in some measure to this cosmic bombardment.

No one knows, as yet, just where cosmic rays come from or how they acquire their enormous energy. Some kind of super-thunderstorm in stars may create them. In any case they form a sort of contact between different stars and galaxies.

Actual material substance in the form of speeding atoms, ions, and electrons, are shot out from one stellar body and absorbed by another. Professor Zwicky points out that this dissemination of matter and energy throughout the universe "may play an essential role in the evolution of stars and galaxies."

Robot Balloons May Be Weather Forecasters

WASHINGTON.—Little robot balloons rising high into the stratosphere and sending back to earth automatic short-wave radio signals are the latest possible aids to knowing what the weather will be two weeks in the future.

Dr. C. G. Abbot, secretary of the Smithsonian institution, Washington, known for his studies on solar variations, told scientists here recently that more accurate and more continuous day-to-day observations of solar radiation will allow forecasting of some features of the weather two weeks in advance.

For the new method of weather forecasting an extension of the present solar radiation observations of the Smithsonian institution will be needed. At present, there are three observatories on high mountain peaks in desert regions. If financial support can be obtained for adding seven observatories to those now operating, the necessary weather forecasting information will be obtained.

Nation's 1935 Fire Loss Near $260,000,000 Mark

ATLANTIC CITY.—The fire loss of the nation for 1935 was $260,000,000, it is revealed in preliminary estimates made at the meeting of the National Fire Protection association here. This is the smallest loss by fire since 1910 and $16,500,000 less than in 1934.

Since September, 1935, it was indicated, the fire losses per month have gradually been increased, bearing out previous predictions that increased business activities would bring fire loss.

Test Tube "Doubles" for Living Body in Medical Study

Tissue Is Kept Alive Long Time in Glass Jar

THE lifeless test tube has finally become an adequate substitute for the living body at the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, at least for purposes of certain scientific studies.

Whole pieces of tissue from adult bodies, instead of cells or bits of embryos, can now, for the first time, be made to live on for long periods and to function normally in a glass jar just as they do in the body.

How this long-attempted scientific feat has been accomplished is described by Dr. Raymond C. Parker of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research in New York, in a report to the journal, Science.

Offers Big Field.

This method of keeping adult tissue alive and functioning in a glass flask is expected to "provide a means of studying a great variety of physiological problems that could not be approached" by other means. Doctor Parker and Dr. K. Landsteiner, the Rockefeller scientist whose researches on blood groups won him the Nobel prize, have already succeeded by this method in studying the formation in these tissue bits of the important disease-fighting substances known as antibodies.

Another noted Rockefeller institute scientist, Dr. Alexis Carrel, long ago succeeded in keeping living tissue alive outside the body and other scientists have done so since then. Doctor Carrel played a part in the research reported by designing the peculiarly shaped flask that substitutes for the body in these latest experiments.

Use Adult Bodies.

Life in the test tube reported, however, differs in certain important respects from that achieved by other methods. The famous chicken heart tissue which Doctor Carrel has kept alive for 24 years, for example, did not come from an adult body, but from an unborn embryo. The test tube life of this famous tissue and of others similarly cultured have not been natural ones. Instead of just existing and performing its natural functions, Doctor Carrel's chicken heart has kept on growing, new cells being formed apparently indefinitely.

The bits of tissue kept alive by Doctor Parker's method were taken from the spleen of adult animals. They do not grow, they just live, as tissue in a grown person's body lives without growing. "Functional survival" is the term used by Doctor Parker to describe this existence of the tissue in his flasks.

Miner Embarrassed When Big Elephant Tumbles Down Shaft

MONTREAL.—Mining in the jungle has its peculiar, often rather heavy, embarrassments. There is, for example, the case of a British mining-engineer friend of Dr. Frank D. Adams, emeritus professor of geology at McGill university.

This engineer runs a tin mine in Malaya, just below the Siamese boundary. His miners, Chinese workmen, have been considerably bothered, because an uncommonly huge crocodile swam up the creek to their settlement, and at the same time a leopard has been snarling and stealing livestock from the land side.

Then one night an elephant wandered into camp and fell down the mine shaft. The fall killed him, of course. Only, the engineer wrote to Doctor Adams, he didn't quite know what to do about it.

Aerial Camera Discloses Land Evading Taxes

ROCHESTER, N. Y.—A tip for tax-harassed towns and cities was presented by Lieut. O. S. Reading, United States Coast and Geodetic survey, in explaining the advantages of aerial surveying before the meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science here recently.

"How little detailed knowledge we have about land and resources," said Lieutenant Reading, "is indicated by tax equalization surveys of some fourteen cities in Connecticut made with the aid of aerial photographs."

"These disclosed so much unrecorded property that the tax rate was lowered an average of 29 per cent, the grand list increased an average of 47 per cent and the cities lifted out of financial difficulties."

Three-quarters of the whole United States, Lieutenant Reading pointed out, is ineffectually mapped.

Vogue of Black or Dark Silk Sheers

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

AS to foremost fashions for summer, costumes of black or dark sheers such as silk chiffons, marquisettes, organza and handsome nets are carrying first honors.

Your wardrobe may be as you supposed replete with chic, but if it be sans one of the beguilingly styled dark sheers better send an immediate S. O. S. call in to your dressmaker or to your smartest store in town or to whoever caters to your sartorial needs. Telling you, we are, that without a suit or a dress of some one or other of these silk sheers or nets in black or in brown, navy or dubonnet red or deep purple dye your summer dress program will be sadly lacking indeed. We might add that black is the favorite of them all.

Especially are fascinating things being done with redingote fashions made of silk sheers that are thin to the point of transparency since they are designed to be worn over either a dress or slip in a solid bright color or of gay print. See the charming and chic ensemble to the right in the picture. It conveys the idea most eloquently. Here a black silk chiffon redingote with the new circular-cut hemline is posed over a pink silk moire slip. Very French in feeling is this most winsome 1936 afternoon dress. Note the black silk taffeta applique of roses on the redingote. The corsage of huge twin roses accurately repeats the pink tone of the silk slip. Narrow velvet ribbon ties about the waist and trims the very lovely pink panama hat worn with this costume.

While we are on the subject of black silk chiffon and its importance in the summer style picture it might be well to mention the new skirts of black chiffon which are the smartest ever for evening, worn with a tunic or jacket-blouse done in flamboyantly colorful flowered print. These skirts are cut full circular and their hemline measures yards. Yet with all this fullness you are not made aware of the fact as the skirt is styled to fit about the hips in slenderizing sleekness gradually and gracefully leading into soft undulations about the hemline. You will find a skirt of this description to be a real asset in your summer clothes collection. Have in reserve a shirtwaist blouse of black net, also a decollette bodice of self black chiffon—an economical way to acquire a wardrobe of smart formals for varied occasion.

If you have an urge for color you will find joy in a costume that poses a redingote of dubonnet red silk chiffon or organza over a slip of gorgeous flower print. The color effect is beyond the telling in word or picture. It requires the evening lights to glorify it.

Could anything in the way of a daytime costume be smarter and more to be coveted than the jacket-and-dress twosome to the left in the illustration! If so we have not discovered it. You may be interested in knowing that this ensemble is of royal lineage in that it is a creation by no less a noted designer than the personal dressmaker to Queen Mary. It came over on the R. M. S. Queen Mary as did a whole fashion load of stunning modes. The dress is perfect for afternoon wear on warm summer days, made as it is of cool Tudor-brown twytex net. The finely pleated and tucked jabot is of white silk net, and the loose coat is of brown crossbar twytex.

The story of net as it unfolds in the summer style program is proving a most fascinating one. Nothing smarter or more practical has centered the style stage than the jacket dresses tailored of cool and comfortable and chic looking nets either in black or the stunning new rich dark colors.

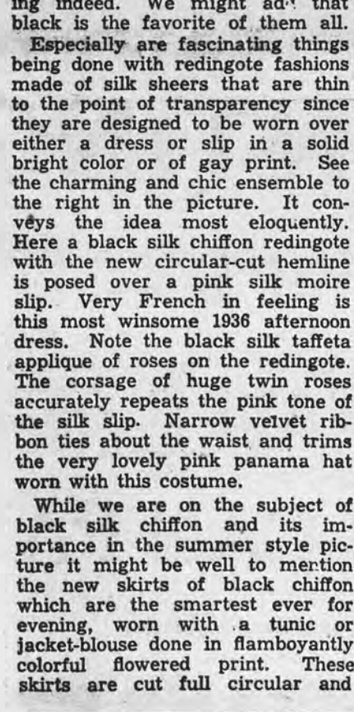
DINNER SUIT

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



The vogue for tailored clothes goes into the evening. Very stylish indeed is the young woman in the picture who wears a strictly tailored dinner suit with its 1890 jacket and buttoned skirt. It is fashioned of creamy white Mt. Airy cloth.

QUILTED COATS FOR BEACH WEAR LATEST

A coat which looks as though it were made from the family's heirloom quilt will go a long way toward creating a sensation on the beaches. Dressier versions that have intricate quilting patterns are destined for wear over summer formals.

Large floral motifs which have bright colors on white or pastel backgrounds are the most fashionable for beach wear. Some of these coats are made of printed cottons which have the designs outlined with quilting, while others are pieced together in the regulation quilt manner.

The quilted coat of plaid woolen, very light of weight and quite gay in its color combinations, is shown for vacation wear, while the taffeta and hand-blocked linen versions are evening favorites.

Flowers Are Dramatic

White flowers on a black gown are dramatic; and on a white gown they emphasize an effect of simplicity. A spot of brilliant scarlet on a white gown is gorgeous. Color harmony may be achieved by wearing flowers that blend into the general tone of the costume, or with a contrasting complementary color.

Flowers Deck Shoes

Shoes have become so fancy that one widely-known Paris house shows street shoes trimmed with applied flowers in contrasting colors and a belt and purse to match.

IMPROVED UNIFORM INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL Lesson

Lesson for August 2

PHILIP'S MISSIONARY LABORS

LESSON TEXT—Acts 8:5-40.

GOLDEN TEXT—Therefore they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word.—Acts 8:4.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Philip Tells the Glad News.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Philip Tells the Glad News.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Pioneering for Jesus.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Gospel Crosses the Frontier.

Evangelism is the work of every follower of Christ, and primarily the work of the layman. This duty cannot be delegated to the church as an organized body or to its official servants.

Philip was a layman, a deacon in the church by office, but an evangelist by the gift and calling of the Holy Spirit. His experience in leading the Ethiopian eunuch to Christ demonstrates that one who is yielded to the Spirit—

I. Will Find Opportunity for Soul Winning (v. 26). Most unexpected places will afford opportunities. Philip was in the midst of a great revival in Samaria when the angel of the Lord sent him to Gaza—a desert place. Who would he meet here? Remember that the great world-evangelist, Dwight L. Moody, was converted in a humble shoe store by the earnest approach of a Sunday school teacher.

II. Will Respond Immediately to the Spirit's Leading (vv. 29, 30). The Spirit said "go." Philip "ran." The fundamental of fundamentals in God's children is obedience. The opportunity, the inquiring soul, the equipped personal worker, all were prepared by God for just that moment. All would have been lost had Philip failed to obey.

III. Will Find That Men and Women Are Ready to Receive the Truth (vv. 28, 31-34).

God prepares souls, and more are willing to be saved than we think. Whether it was through his experience at Jerusalem, his spiritual hunger before he went up, or the reading of the Word, or all these together, the eunuch was ready.

Neighbors, schoolmates, tradespeople, fellow workers—they may present God's opportunity for us.

IV. Will Find That God Honors Men by Using Them to Win Others. He could "save a man all alone on the top of the Alps," but he doesn't ordinarily do it. Remember it was "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon" that wrought a victory. The eunuch needed an interpreter of the truth. Philip was God's man.

V. Will Know God's Word (v. 35), We cannot interpret what we do not know. One who is not personally acquainted with the Living Word by regeneration, and the Written Word by diligent study, is not able to help others. Could you begin (as Philip did) at Isaiah 53:7, and lead a man to Christ? If not, should you not begin to study your Bible with such an end in view?

VI. Will "Carry Through" to a Decision (vv. 36, 37).

A salesman may be brilliant, cultured, and persuasive, but what counts is the signature on the dotted line at the bottom of an order. Philip pressed for and obtained a decision.

VII. Will Follow-up His Convert (vv. 36, 37).

Much so-called evangelism fails to go beyond a mere profession—a declaration of faith. The eunuch and Philip both knew that an inward faith declares itself in an outward act—and he was baptized.

VIII. Will Recognize That the Message Is Important, Not the Messenger (v. 39). When the work was done the evangelist was carried away by the Spirit. God's work goes on. His workman we set aside. As an advertising company has well-expressed it, "The purpose of advertising is to impress the product upon the reader's mind, not the medium."

It is a fine testimony to the effectiveness of Philip's ministry that although he was gone his convert went "on his way rejoicing." His faith did not rest on the evangelist nor any human fellowship—he knew God. Let us be sure to win souls to God and not simply to a personal allegiance to us or to a religious organization.

Why not be a Philip? Any man or woman who knows the Lord Jesus Christ as personal Savior can be a winner of souls. It has well been said that all that Philip had was "a love for souls, a knowledge of the Word and a sensitiveness to the leading of the Lord. That is all we need. If every Christian were a Philip the world would be won for Christ in ten years."

Count Your Blessings

He is a wise man who does not grieve for the things which he has not, but rejoices for those which he has.—Epictetus.

Self-Knowledge

Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control, these three alone lead life to sovereign power.—Tennyson.

Selfishness is the making a man's self his own center, the beginning and end of all he doth.—John Owen.

THERE is something very heartening in the knowledge that we can all help each other, and that the worst suffering of all—that of loneliness or bereavement—need never be an actual desolation; for there is always someone ready to salve the deepest wound with the balm of sympathy, and the warm clasp of some comforting hand, the tears in some kind eyes are the surest proofs that the heart under its human aspect has the power to call the hidden soul to life.

The Home Demonstration Club of Shelby met at the club room on Friday, July 10th for their regular all day meeting. Each member carried lunch and work to do. Miss Nolen came at the noon hour and had lunch with the ladies. After an enjoyable lunch, we went to the home of Mrs. W. H. Brymer where we had canning demonstrations using the pressure cooker. Canning carrots, okra and squash. The cooker was signed for by members and left with the club for community canning. Miss Nolen gave a very interesting talk on vital needs of preserving all food available and planning fall gardens to help meet the demands for food for winter. This being so important due to the shortage of food cahsed by the drougth.

Plans were made to attend the Club rally day in Columbiana on Wednesday, July 15th. 13 members were present.

Drouth Conference

At a drouth conference attended by the Home Demonstration Agents from Coosa, Talladega, Clay Randolph and Shelby Counies on Thursday of last week, July 9th. A plan was proposed whereby fall gardens might provide food for preservation for the winter supply. Up to the present time here has been very litle food canned and if the pantrys of Shelby County are to be filled with a winter supply of food, it is going to be necessary that we raise fall gardens, provided we get a bit of moisture from now on.

It is very necessary that we encourage our neighbors both white and black, to plant fall gardens.

The following information has been received from the Agricultural Department at Auburn, and special stress is being laid upon greens, beans and potatoes. It is hoped that the enclosed table for planting giving varieities, etc, will be of value to not only the home demonstration club members but to every person who is interested in having food supplies for their family this winter It is more important that we make a concerted effort from now on since so much damage has been done by the drouth.

HOME DEMONSTRATION CLUB MEETINGS POSTPONED

All regular monthly meetings and community meetings of the Home Demonstration Clubs are cancelled indefinitely until the epidemic of infantile paralysis has subsided. Meetings will be resumed as soon as advised by the County Health officer.

The plans for the community picnics for the month of August are also cancelled until further notice.

May we encourage you to cooperate with your Health Officer in the precautions for this dreaded disease.

Marye Elizabeth Nolen.

Members of the Wright Home Demonstration Club met at the home of Mrs. Tom Morris on Thursday the 23rd day of July and held a very good demonstration on food preservation. which was given by Miss Nolen, the demonstration agent. Corn was the only vegetable canned, as the drouth has affected our gardens greatly, but we left the meeting with a strong determination to plant a fall garden and yet fill our jars as well as our pantry shelves. A report was given on the rally held at the Courthouse, and committees were appointed to serve on the following ways and means compaign for new members and too, we made plans for the annual club picnic to be held inAugust. The attendance was not so good, on account of Infantile Paralysis, which has reached our county already. We hope to have a better attendance at our next meeting.

We want to say here that Mrs. B. L. Jones one of our foremost club members recently won a dollar for the best recipe for Chocolate Chiffon Pie in the Birmingham News.

Vegetables Farmers May Plant In July

AUBURN—Many vegetables may be planted by Alabama farmers during July, advises Prof. L. M. Ware, head of the horticulture and forestry department of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute.

Irish potatoes, collards, cabbage, beets, carrots, tomatoes, beans, lima beans, okra corn, peas, kale, mustard and turnips are some of those listed by Prof. Ware in stressing the importance of planting these crops this year because of the serious damage done earlier vegetables by the drouth this spring. Full information on how to succeed with each of these crops this summer may be obtained from county farm and home demonstration agents.

1. Select if possible a moist but well-drained productive bottom land.
2. The land must be free of weed and grass; however, deep preparation must be avoided if undue drying of the soil is to be escaped. Therefore planting should be done with the least possible disturbing of the soil if the land is free of weeds.
3. Double quantities of most seed should be planted in summer as in spring, and seed should be planted deeper. The soil should be firmly packed about the seed and little loose soil left above the packed soil to pre ven excessive loss of moisture and crusting.
4. Seed planted during summer months should usually be planted on flat beds or in shallow frrows rather than on high beds.
5. A very good fertilizer for most vegetables consists of 800 pounds per acre of a 6-8-4 grade or 800 pounds per acre of a 4-8-4 with 150 pounds per acre side application of nitrate. Fertilizers should be put in a furrow under the seed and will mixed with the soil. Seeds should never come in contact with fertilizers.
6. Garden insects are very likely to seriously damage summer vegetables. The plants may be injured while small to such an extent as to destroy the stand. It will be advisable to have on hand at all times a supply of a Derris-sulphur mixture. (1 part of Derris to 7 parts of sulphur.)

Poultry Requires Care During The Summer

AUBURN—Poultry flocks will return bigger profits during the hot summer months if given water, reports John E. Ivey, extension poultryman, in advising that birds will not grow or lay well when over-crowded in hot, poorly ventilated houses.

However, provision should be made to protect the young birds from chilling at night, he warns.

Since green feed is scarce and hard to digest during hot, dry weather, a good fish oil should be placed in all growing mash fed during the summer months to provide the necessary vitamins, he advises.

A well balanced developing mash should be before growin gbirds at all times. Instead of saving on feed costs by cutting down the amount fed each bird, cull the poor layers out of the flock.

A wet mash should be fed layers to help maintain summer egg production. This should be fed in troughs in the early afternoon, giving the birds all they will clean up in about 20 minutes, feed about 3 pounds per 100 hens.
